Second.—The right of association for all lawful purposes by the employed as well as by the employers.

Third.—The payment to the employed of a wage adequate to maintain a reasonable standard of life as this is understood in their time and country.

Fourth.—The adoption of an eight hours day or a forty-eight hours week as the standard to the aimed at where it has not already been attained.

Fifth.—The adoption of a weekly rest of at least twenty-four hours, which should include Sunday wherever practicable.

Sixth.—The abolition of child labour and the imposition of such limitations on the labour of young persons as shall permit the continuation of their education and assure their proper physical development.

Seventh.—The principle that men and women should receive equal remuneration for work of equal value.

Eighth.—The standard set by law in each country with respect to the conditions of labour should have due regard to the equitable economic treatment of all workers lawfully resident therein.

Ninth.—Each State should make provision for a system of inspection in which women should take part in order to ensure the enforcement of the laws and regulations for the protection of the employed.

Without claiming that these methods and principles are either complete or final, the High Contracting Parties are of opinion that they are well fitted to guide the policy of the League of Nations; and that, if adopted by the industrial communities who are members of the League, and safeguarded in practice by an adequate system of such inspection, they will confer lasting benfits upon the wage-earners of the world.

PART XIV.

GUARANTEES.

Section I. Western Europe.

ARTICLE 428.

As a guarantee for the execution of the present Treaty by Germany, the German territory situated to the west of the Rhine, together with the bridgeheads, will be occupied by Allied and Associated troops for a period of fifteen years from the coming into force of the present Treaty.

ARTICLE 429.

If the conditions of the present Treaty are faithfully carried out by Germany, the occupation referred to in Article 428 will be successively restricted as follows:

(i) At the expiration of five years there will be evacuated:—the bridgehead of Cologne and the territories north of a line running along the Ruhr, then along the railway Jülich, Duren, Euskirchen, Rheinbach, thence along the road Rheinbach to Sinzig, and reaching the Rhine at the confluence with the Ahr; the roads, railways and places mentioned above being excluded from the area evacuated.

(ii) At the expiration of ten years, there will be evacuated:—the bridgehead of Coblenz and the territories north of a line to be drawn from the intersection between the frontiers of Belgium, Germany and Holland, running about 4 kilometres south of Aix-la-Chapelle, then to and following the crest of Forst Gemünd, then east of the railway of the Urft Valley, then along Blankenheim, Valdorf, Dreis, Ulmen to and following the Moselle from Bremm to Nehren, then passing by Kappel and Simmern, then following the ridge of the heights between Simmern and the Rhine and reaching this river at Bacharach; all the places, valleys, roads and railways mentioned above being excluded from the area evacuated.

(iii) At the expiration of fifteen years there will be evacuated:—the bridgehead of Mainz, the bridgehead of Kehl and the remainder of the German territory under occupation.

If at that date the guarantees against unprovoked aggression by Germany are not considered sufficient by the Allied and Associated Governments, the evacuation of the occupying troops may be delayed to the extent regarded as necessary for the purpose of obtaining the required guarantees.

ARTICLE 430.

In case either during the occupation or after the expiration of the fifteen years referred to above, the Reparation Commission finds that Germany refuses to observe the whole or part of her obligations under the present Treaty with regard to Reparation, the whole or part of the areas specified in Article 429 will be re-occupied immediately by the Allied and Associated forces.

ARTICLE 431.

If before the expiration of the period of fifteen years Germany complies with all the undertakings resulting from the present Treaty, the occupying forces will be withdrawn immediately.

ARTICLE 432.

All matters relating to the occupation and not provided for by the present Treaty shall be regulated by subsequent agreements, which Germany hereby undertakes to observe.

Section II. Eastern Europe.

ARTICLE 433.

As a guarantee for the execution of the provisions of the present Treaty, by which Germany accepts definitely the abrogation of the Brest-Litovsk Treaty, and of all treaties, conventions and agreements entered into by her with the Maximalist Government in Russia, and in order to ensure the restoration of peace and good government in the Baltic Provinces and Lithuania, all German troops at present in the said territories shall return to within the frontiers of Germany as soon as the Governments of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers shall think the moment suitable, having regard to the internal situation of these territories. These troops shall abstain from all requisitions and seizures and from any other coercive measures, with a view to obtaining supplies intended for Germany, and shall in no way interfere with such measures for national defence as may be adopted by the Provisional Governments of Esthonia, Latvia and Lithuania.

No other German troops shall, pending the evacuation or after the evacuation is complete, be admitted to the said territories.

PART XV.

MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS.

ARTICLE 434.

Germany undertakes to recognise the full force of the Treaties of Peace and Additional Conventions which may be concluded by the Allied and Associated Powers with the Powers who fought on the side of Germany and to recognise whatever dispositions may be made concerning the territories of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarch, of the Kingdom of Bulgaria and of the Ottoman Empire, and to recognize the new States within their frontiers as there laid down.

ARTICLE 435.

The High Contracting Parties, while they recognize the guarantees stipulated by the treaties of 1815, and especially by the Act of 20th November, 1815, in favour of Switzerland, the said guarantees constituting international obligations for the maintenance of peace, declare nevertheless that the provisions of these treaties, conventions, declarations and other supplementary Acts concerning the neutralized zone of Savoy, as laid down in paragraph 1 of Article 92 of the Final Act of the Congress of Vienna and in paragraph 2 of Article 3 of the Treaty of Paris of 20th November, 1815, are no longer consistent with present conditions. For this reason the High Contracting Parties take note of the agreement reached between the French Government and the Swiss Government for the abrogation of the stipulations relating to this zone which are and remain abrogated.

The High Contracting Parties also agree that the stipulations of the Treaties of 1815 and of the other supplementary Acts concerning the free zones of Upper Savoy and the Gex district are no longer consistent with present conditions, and that it is for France and Switzerland to come to an agreement together with a view to settling between themselves the status of these territories under such conditions as shall be considered suitable by both countries.

ANNEX.

The Swiss Federal Council has informed the French Government that after examining the provisions of Article 435 in a like spirit of sincere friendship it has happily reached the conclusion that it was possible to acquiesce in it under the following conditions and reservations:

1 The neutralized zone of Haute-Savoie:

a) It will be understood that as long as the Federal Chambers have not ratified the agreement come to between the two Governments concerning the abrogation of the stipulations in respect of the neutralized zone of Savoy, nothing will be definitively settled, on one side or the other, in regard to this subject.

b) The assent given by the Swiss Government to the abrogation of the above mentioned stipulations presupposes, in conformity with the text adopted, the recognition of the guarantees formulated in favour of Switzerland by the treaties of 1815 and particularly by the Declaration of 20th November 1815.

c) The agreement between the Governments of France and Switzerland for the abrogation of the above mentioned stipulations will only be considered as valid if the Treaty of Peace contains this article in its present wording. In addition the Parties to the Treaty of Peace should endeavour to obtain the assent of the signatory Powers of the treaties of 1815 and of the Declaration of 20th November 1815 which are not signatories of the present Treaty of Peace.

2 Free zone of Haute-Savoie and the district of Gex.

a) The Federal Council makes the most express reservations to the interpretation to be given to the statement mentioned in the last paragraph of the above article for insertion in the Treaty of Peace, which provides that the stipulations of the Treaties of 1815 and other supplementary acts concerning the free zones of Haute-Savoie and the Gex district are no longer consistent with the present circumstances. The Federal Council would not wish that its acceptance of the above wording should lead to the conclusion that it would agree to the suppression of a system intended to give neighbouring territory the benefit of a special regime appropriate to the geographical and economical situation and which has been well tested.

In the opinion of the Federal Council the question is not the modification of the customs system of the zones as set up by the treaties mentioned above, but only the regulation in a manner more appropriate to the economic conditions of the present day; the terms of the exchange of goods between the regions in question. The Federal Council has been led to make the preceding observations by the perusal of the draft convention concerning the future constitution of the zones which was annexed to the note of April 26 from the French Governmentations. While making the above reserve the Federal Council declares its readiness to examine in the most friendly spirit any proposals which the French Government may deem it convenient to make on the subject.

b) It is conceded that the stipulations of the treaties of 1815 and other supplementary acts relative to the free zones will remain in force until a new arrangement is come to between France and Switzerland to regulate matters in this territory.

ARTICLE 436.

The High Contracting Parties declare and place on record that they have taken note of the treaty signed by the Government of the French Republic on July 17th, 1918, with His Serene Highness the Prince of Monaco defining the relations between France and the Principality.

ARTICLE 437.

The High Contracting Parties agree that, in the absence of a subsequent agreement to the contrary, the Chairman of any Commission established by the present Treaty shall in the event of an equality of votes be entitled to a second vote.

ARTICLE 438.

The Allied and Associated Powers agree that where Christian religious missions were being maintained by German societies or persons in territory belonging to them, or of which the government is entrusted to them in accordance with the present Treaty, the property which these missions or missionary societies possessed, including that of trading societies whose profits were devoted to the support of missions, shall continue to be devoted to missionary purposes. In order to ensure the due execution of this undertaking the Allied and Associated Governments will hand over such property to boards of trustees appointed by or approved by the Governments and composed of persons holding the Christian faith. It will be the duty of such boards of trustees to see that the property continues to be applied to missionary purposes.

The obligations undertaken by the Allied and Associated Governments in this Article will not in any way prejudice their control or authority as to the individuals by whom the missions are conducted.

Germany, taking note of the above undertaking, agrees to accept all arrangements made or to be made by the Allied or Associated Government concerned for carrying on the work of the said missions or trading societies and waives all claims on their behalf.

ARTICLE 439.

Without prejudice to the provisions of the present Treaty, Germany undertakes not to put forward directly or indirectly against any Allied or Associated Power, Signatory of the present Treaty, including those which without having declared war, have broken off diplomatic relations with the German Empire, any pecuniary claim based on events which occurred at any time before the coming into force of the present Treaty.

The present stipulation will bar completely and finally all claims of this nature, which will be thenceforward extinguished, whoever may be the parties in interest.

ARTICLE 440.

Germany accepts and recognises as valid and binding all decrees and orders concerning German ships and goods and all orders relating to the payment of costs made by any Prize Court of any of the Allied or Associated Powers, and undertakes not to put forward any claim arising out of such decrees or orders on behalf of any German national.

The Allied and Associated Powers reserve the right to examine in such manner as they may determine all decisions and orders of German Prize Courts, whether affecting the property rights of nationals of those Powers or of neutral Powers. Germany agrees to furnish copies of all the documents constituting the record of the cases, including the decisions and orders made, and to accept and give effect to the recommendations made after such examination of the cases.

The present Treaty, of which the French and English texts are both authentic, shall be ratified.

The deposit of ratifications shall be made at Paris as soon as possible.

Powers of which the seat of the Government is outside Europe will be entitled merely to inform the Government of the French Republic through their diplomatic representative at Paris that their ratification has been given; in that case they must transmit the instrument of ratification as soon as possible.

A first procès-verbal of the deposit of ratifications will be drawn up as soon as the Treaty has been ratified by Germany on the one hand, and by three of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers on the other hand.

From the date of this first procès-verbal the Treaty will come into force between the High Contracting Parties who have ratified it. For the determination of all periods of time provided for in the present Treaty this date will be the date of the coming into force of the Treaty.

In all other respects the Treaty will enter into force for each Power at the date of the deposit of its ratification.

The French Government will transmit to all the signatory Powers a certified copy of the procès-verbaux of the deposit of ratifications.

In faith whereof the above-named Plenipotentiaries have signed the present Treaty.

Done at Versailles, in a single copy which will remain deposited in the archives of the French Republic, and of which authenticated copies will be transmitted to each of the Signatory Powers.

TELEGRAPH AND TELEPHONE CONTROL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 120) to repeal chapter 154 of the act of the second session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, being the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution to authorize the President in time of war to supervise or take possession and assume control of any telegraph, telephone, marine cable or radio system or systems, or any part thereof, and to operate the same in such manner as may be needful or desirable for the duration of the war, and to provide just compensation therefor," approved July 16, 1918.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the bill under consideration is a bill introduced by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] to repeal the act of July 16, 1918, which gave to the President the power or authority to take possession of and operate the cable, telegraph, and telephone systems of the United States.

I do not intend to enter upon the disputed question with regard to the necessity for this act of Congress or the subsequent act of the President. I regard both as immaterial. I think, however, that it can be said with a fair degree of assurance that it is now the desire of the people of this country that these systems of cable, telegraphic, and telephonic communication shall be returned to their owners for private operation, at least until some scheme is devised for a change in regulation and control. I think it can be safely said that this is the view of the President of the United States. I think it can be said with equal assurance that this is the view of the Postmaster General, who has had control during the period that has intervened since the Government took possession. The act takes effect immediately upon its approval, and at that time these wire systems of communication will be returned completely to those who have heretofore operated them.

With respect to the desirability of return I shall say nothing, assuming that all Senators have made up their minds upon the subject and that they are in accord. The committee, however, to which the bill was referred has added to the measure an amendment which, I think, it is incumbent upon me to explain very briefly. During the period of Federal control or possession the Postmaster General increased by order or approval many of the rates which had theretofore governed the service. I am now speaking entirely of the telephone, for the amendment to which I have referred does not embrace either the cable or the telegraph lines. When I say "amendment" I do not mean that the cable and telegraph lines are not to be returned to their owners; but the amendment, which relates to rates which have been established by the Postmaster General, does not embrace either cable or telegraph systems.

As I remarked a moment ago, the Postmaster General found it necessary to increase the rates both in the toll service and in the exchange service. Senators, of course, will recognize the difference between the two. The toll service is that service which is rendered by telephone companies in the transmission of long-distance communications. The exchange service is that rendered to the people of a given community or city, and which enables one person to connect himself with another for the purpose of talking over small or limited areas.

The order which increased the toll rates is known as Bulletin No. 22. The order itself is No. 2495. The order was somewhat modified subsequently but not in any material way, and the paper which I now hold in my hand and which was laid before the committee shows the rates as they were increased by order of the Postmaster General. These applied to the entire toll service of the country, not only the toll service rendered by what is known as the Bell system, operated by the American Telegraph & Telephone Co., but the service rendered by the independent companies throughout the country as well. There is no uniformity in the increase in rates; that is to say, the increase as applied to one company may not have been and was not, in fact, the same increase as experienced by another company, but I make no criticism in that respect.

The probable increase, although that can not be stated with absolute certainty, in the toll rates was something like 18 or 20 per cent. Some of those who have estimated the matter think it was even less. The increase in the exchange rates was made in a great number of orders of approval by the Postmaster General, which I have in my hand.

In order that the RECORD may show just what has been done by the Postmaster General in this regard, I desire to incorporate as a part of my observations, first, the order, No. 2495, relating to the toll service and, second, a synopsis of the various orders relating to an increase in exchange rates.

There are in the United States more than 50,000 telephone companies. Most of those companies, however, render a very limited service.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Fifty thousand companies?

Mr. CUMMINS. There are in the United States more than 50,000 telephone companies. That may need a moment's explanation. By far the greater number of these companies are what are known as farmers' mutual telephone companies; companies in which a few men or a small community band themselves together for the purpose of furnishing each other telephonic communication and which are really without profit, intended merely as a convenience for those who are in that particular community. Some of these telephone companies have connection with larger companies having a switchboard, and which in turn connect the small companies with the larger ones doing a general business. There are more than 10,000 companies, however, in this country which do a general exchange business; that is to say, which have a switchboard located at some central point and that enables the subscribers or patrons of that system to use it in the way which is perfectly well known to all of us. These companies, so far as they are supposed to render service of an interstate character, report to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and of them the Interstate Commerce Commission has the same full complete authority that it has over the railways of the country. I beg to read a communication which came to me from the office of the Postmaster General, which explains the situation so far as the increases of rates in exchange service are concerned. This communication says:

MEMORANDUM ON TELEPHONE EXCHANGE RATE INCREASES APPROVED BY THE POSTMASTER GENERAL.

According to the special census of telegraphs and telephones in the United States, taken in 1917, the preliminary results of which have recently been made available, the total number of telephone systems and lines in the United States at that time was 53,035. Their income from all sources amounted to $391,476,926. The income of the Bell System—alone amounted to $311,918,260, or approximately 80 per cent of this total.

That refers to companies which are operated under the direction and control of the American Telegraph & Telephone Co.—

That means that the companies which I have just mentioned transact substantially 80 per cent of the telephone business of the United States.

Of the independent lines and systems, those with a gross annual revenue of $5,000 or more reported a total income of $60,583,540; the other independent lines and systems reported a total income of $18,975,126.

Far the greater number of these independent lines and systems are the property of small rural companies, or of so-called mutual companies or cooperative associations, or are farmers' individual or party lines. The vast majority of them make no regular reports to any agency of the Federal Government.

The Interstate Commerce Commission receives annual reports from nearly 9,000 of these lines and systems. Companies reporting annual operating revenues of $250,000 or more are designated as class A companies; those reporting annual operating revenues exceeding $50,000, but less than $250,000, as class B companies; those reporting annual operating revenues exceeding $10,000 but less than $50,000, as class C companies. These three classes together, whose reports are made in accordance with a system of accounts prescribed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, account for less than 1,000 of the total number of the companies reporting to the Interstate Commerce Commission. The remainder, slightly over 8,000 companies, are designated as class D, but make no complete annual returns, and keep no standard or uniform accounts. From the numerous small companies and lines no returns whatever are received.

For the year 1917 class A, B, and C companies reported to the Interstate Commerce Commission a total operating revenue of $346,101,039. This figure excludes all nonoperating revenue reported by class A, B, and C companies, as well as the revenue from all sources of all the other companies covered by the special census of the same year. Of the total operating revenue reported by the class A, B, and C companies, $295,616,146, or approximately 85 per cent, was reported by the companies of the Bell System. The balance, $50,484,893, was reported by independent class A, B, and C companies. Of the independent companies operating exchange systems, 23 belong to class A, 109 to class B, and the balance, approximately 530, to class C. The total number of independent telephone companies, for which rate increases have been approved by the Postmaster General since the wire systems were taken over into Federal control, is 211.

I am reading this communication largely in order that this latter fact may be well known to the Senate.

Of the 23 class A companies, 15 have participated in rate increases approved by the Postmaster General. Of the 109 class B companies, 25 have participated in rate increases approved by the Postmaster General. The balance is divided between the class C and class D companies.

According to the latest reports to the Interstate Commerce Commission, the majority being for the year 1918, the independent class A companies had a total operating revenue of more than $26,000,000, of which more than $20,000,000 was received by the companies in this class which participated in rate increases approved by the Postmaster General. It has not been possible in the time available to complete a corresponding calculation for the other classes of companies. The total operating revenues, however, of the independent class D companies, according to the latest reports to the Interstate Commerce Commission, were approximately twelve and one-half millions, or less than half of the total for the class A companies, and the proportion of companies participating in rate increases in this class as in class A was greater among the larger than the smaller companies. It is apparent, therefore, that the companies which do the bulk of the business of the independent companies reporting to the Interstate Commerce Commission have participated in the rate increases made effective by the Postmaster General.

Before I go further, Mr. President, I wish to say that the amendment which was reported by the committee is withdrawn by authority of the committee and the following is offered in its stead. It is an amendment to section 1 of the bill. Section 1 refers first to chapter 154 of the acts of the second session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, which is the act authorizing the President to take over these systems. As it was originally introduced, it concluded:

Joint resolution to authorize the President in time of war to supervise or take possession and assume control of any telegraph, telephone, marine cable, or radio system or systems, or any part thereof, and to operate the same in such manner as may be needful or desirable for the duration of the war and to provide just compensation therefor," approved on the 16th day of July, 1918, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The committee proposes the following amendment:

Provided, however, That the existing toll and exchange telephone rates as established or approved by the Postmaster General on or prior to June 6, 1919, shall continue in force for a period of 90 days, but not longer, after this act takes effect, unless they shall be sooner modified or changed by the public authorities—State, municipal, or otherwise—having control thereof prior to the time the Government took possession of the telephone systems under the act of July 16, 1918, or by contract or by voluntary reduction; it being the intent that after the approval of this act the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission and all the authority of the States, municipalities, or other public control over the properties of which the United States assumed the possession and operation under the act of July 16, 1918, shall be immediately restored.

There is a great difference of opinion, Mr. President, among lawyers with regard to the continuing effect of the rates which have been established, approved, and promulgated by the Postmaster General. There are some students of the subject who believe that those rates all cease immediately upon the restoration of the properties to their owners. There are others who believe—and I confess that I am one of the others—that without legislation rates which have been lawfully established by the Postmaster General—and the Supreme Court held, as you will remember, last Monday, a week ago to-day, that the action of the Postmaster General in establishing these increased rates was lawful—will continue until they are set aside by proceedings instituted by some one who has the right to institute proceedings of that character, whether the time be 1 month or 6 months or 12 months.

It was thought better, therefore, by the committee, in view of the difficult question of law—which can not possibly be settled, for there is no opportunity to settle it, at least within any reasonable time—that we should continue the rates which had been promulgated by the Postmaster General for a specified time, leaving all of the companies and the public and all who are interested in the subject at liberty to apply instantly to the various controlling authorities of the States and municipalities for such modifications of the order or orders as they might be advised was necessary in order to protect the various interests involved in these enterprises.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, would it disturb the Senator if I should ask him a question at this point?

Mr. CUMMINS. Not at all.

Mr. THOMAS. Can the Senator state approximately what the aggregate amount of the annual or monthly increase is?

Mr. CUMMINS. We were not able to ascertain that. The best information that we could procure in the limited time we had for consideration was that the increase was somewhere in the neighborhood of 20 per cent. The communication which I have read indicates for those companies which have reported to the Interstate Commerce Commission their revenues for the year 1917; so that the application of that percentage to those revenues will indicate the average increase.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. KING. I did not quite hear all of the amendment. Does it perpetuate the rates of the cable companies and the telegraph companies or only of the telephone companies?

Mr. CUMMINS. It only applies to the telephone companies. I can say, with regard to that, that the cable companies have been already really retransferred, and neither the Western Union Telegraph Co. nor the Postal Telegraph & Cable Co. asked for a continuation of the higher rates, although the representative of one of the companies stated that he thought they ought to be continued. The reason the committee did not take up or consider that phase of the matter was probably this: The representative of the Postal Telegraph & Cable Co. came before the committee and said that it was entirely satisfied with the rates that existed before the Government took possession of the property, and that the moment the possession and control of the property is restored to the corporation it intended to reduce the rates 20 per cent, the amount which it is understood the rates were raised by the Government. If the Postal Telegraph & Cable Co. reduces these rates, as the committee was advised would be done by the chief officer of the corporation, the Western Union Telegraph Co. will be compelled, of course, to follow the decrease or the reduction. For that reason the committee did not even consider the necessity of maintaining the telegraph rates at their present point, but left that entirely with the law. I repeat that in my opinion—although I express it with great diffidence and with no assurance from any adjudicated case—these rates will continue until they are set aside by some properly constituted authority or until the companies actually reduce them of their own accord.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit another inquiry?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think that if it were wise to perpetuate the rates of the telephone companies, exchange rates, and so on, for a limited period, the same reason would prompt legislation perpetuating the rates of the telegraph companies?

Mr. CUMMINS. The committee thought it was wise to continue the rates for the telephone companies for a period of 90 days for two reasons: The first is the reason that I have already stated, the doubt with regard to the interpretation of the law respecting the continuance, without legislative interference, of the rates established by the Postmaster General; second, because unquestionably the cost of operation on the part of the telephone companies of the country has very greatly increased. No one can doubt the fact that the labor cost, the material cost, and every other expense incident to maintenance and operation have increased more than 20 per cent during the last year and a half. Many of these companies, I suppose most of them, had applications before their respective State authorities pending at the time the Government took possession for an increase of rates by reason of increases in the cost of maintenance and operation. The assumption by the Government of this business ended all that undertaking and suspended for the time being the jurisdiction of the various State authorities. The committee believes with regard to the telephone companies, assuming that they were not earning any more than they should have earned before the Government took possession, that they ought to have the benefit of the continuance of these increased rates until they have had an opportunity to present their cases to the State authorities and secure from those bodies of regulation and control such orders as to the States may seem necessary to sustain these companies and to make their income equal to their outgo.

It is perfectly apparent that we could not enter upon an inquiry with regard to the financial situation of each of the eight or ten thousand companies which report to the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is an impossible task; and we had to assume—and I think we could properly assume—that there could be no great injustice wrought by perpetuating the orders of the Postmaster General for a period of 90 days, so that each company can present its particular case, its particular necessities, to the State authorities or to the Interstate Commerce Commission, as he case may be, and there receive such an award with regard to rates as will be just and equitable.

These are the reasons which have led the committee to the recommendation which it has made, and which I have endeavored to explain.

I was originally very doubtful with regard to the continuance of these rates as applied to exchange systems which, in my judgment, are of purely State concern; and whatever may be the movement of the future with regard to them, I can not but hope that the Federal Government will never undertake to control their affairs or to establish their rates; but we can not ignore the fact that it will require some time to enable these companies to make the transition from Government possession and control to the control of the several States, and, therefore, we presented this amendment.

It will be found that the increases in exchange rates cover a very large part of all the exchange business in the United States. The orders cover a few companies, comparatively, but the companies which are embraced in the orders of the Postmaster General do so large a part of the business that I think it can not be charged that to establish an increase with respect to them without at the same time establishing an increase with respect to others will do injustice. In any event, the period will soon elapse, and then the State authorities will deal with the subject, as they may, indeed, from the date the act is passed, as seems to them just.

Mr. President, I offer the amendment in behalf of the committee, which I read a moment ago.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the amendment already printed in the bill, on page 2, it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, however, That the existing toll and exchange telephone rates as established or approved by the Postmaster General on or prior to June 6, 1919, shall continue in force for a period of 90 days, but not longer, after this act takes effect, unless they shall be sooner modified or changed by the public authorities—State, municipal, or otherwise—having control thereof prior to the time the Government took possession of the telephone systems under the act of July 16, 1918, or by contract or by voluntary reduction; it being the intent that after the approval of this act the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission and all the authority of the States, municipalities, or other public control over the properties of which the United States assumed the possession and operation under the act of July 16, 1918, shall be immediately restored.

Mr. CURTIS and Mr. POMERENE addressed the Chair.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. I understand the amendment can hardly be acted upon to-night, and I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa if he will not consent temporarily to lay aside his bill so that I may present a conference report on the Indian appropriation bill, which will take but a few moments.

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me a word?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I rose for the purpose of inquiring whether or not the chairman of the committee was going to insist upon having this matter disposed of to-night?

Mr. CUMMINS. No, Mr. President; I do not think it would be wise to insist upon a disposition of the matter to-night. I know there are Senators not here just now who desire possibly to make some observations in regard to it, and I know that the amendment which I have just offered will be better understood if it is printed in the RECORD and Senators have an opportunity to examine it. I had it in mind, after offering the amendment, to move an adjournment of the Senate.

Mr. POMERENE. I wish to submit a few observations; but, if the matter is to go over, I will defer them until to-morrow morning.

Mr. CUMMINS. In view of the request made by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

INDIAN APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. CURTIS. I present the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration. It is a unanimous report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the conference report.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2480) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses for the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the matter covered in amendment 6 and insert the following in lieu thereof:

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 9, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the matter covered by amendment No. 9 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in his discretion, and under such terms and conditions as he may prescribe, to cause to be issued to the Gospel Missionary Union, which has engaged in mission work among the Navajo Indians since 1896, a patent in fee for mission purposes only for that particular tract of land on the Western Navajo Reservation, in Arizona, not exceeding 160 acres in area, which it has continuously used and occupied for mission purposes from a date prior to the Executive order of January 8, 1900, withdrawing from sale and settlement the lands which now constitute the said reservation; said patent in fee shall be issued on a legal description of the land so used: Provided, That if said land shall cease to be used for mission purposes the same shall revert to the Navajo Tribe of Indians.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 10, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the words "two thousand dollars" and insert "one thousand dollars" in lieu thereof; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 34, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the matter contained in amendment 34 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Provided further, That from the sums heretofore appropriated for said Pottawatomie Indians the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay to Erik O. Morstad, of Leona, Wis., in person and in full satisfaction for services rendered, the sum of $2,000."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 35, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by Senate amendment No. 35 insert the following:

"For the purchase of subsistence supplies in relieving cases of actual distress and suffering among those needy St. Croix Indians of Wisconsin whose cases are referred to in report of January 30, 1915, transmitted by the Secretary of the Interior to the House of Representatives March 3, 1915, pursuant to the provisions of the act of Congress of August 1, 1914 (38 Stat. L., pp. 582–605), and printed as House Document No. 1663, Sixty-third Congress, third session, $1,000."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 39, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by Senate amendment No. 39 insert:

"For the construction of a road from the village of Odanah, in the Bad River Reservation, to the south line of said reservation, $20,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, said sum to be reimbursable from any funds now or hereafter placed in the Treasury to the credit of the Indians on the Bad River Reservation, to remain a charge and lien upon the funds of said tribe of Indians until paid: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may cooperate with the State of Wisconsin in the construction of said road: Provided further, That no part of the money herein appropriated shall be expended until the Secretary of the Interior shall have obtained from the proper authorities of the State of Wisconsin satisfactory guaranties of the payment by the said State of at least one-half of the cost of the construction of said road."

CHARLES CURTIS,
ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE,
HENRY F. ASHURST,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

HOMER P. SNYDER,
P. P. CAMPBELL,
C. D. CARTER,
Managers on the part of the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, June 10, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, June 9, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou Great Spirit, author of the vast universe, Father of all souls, inspire us, we beseech Thee, with an earnest desire to use the faculties of mind and soul, which Thou hast bestowed upon us, for the betterment of all mankind.

Turn all evil hearts to good and all good hearts to servants in the vineyard of the Lord, that Thy kingdom may come and Thy will be done in earth as in heaven, through the precepts and example of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, under the rules of the House to-day, being the second Monday in the month, is set apart for the consideration of such business as may be presented by the Committee on the District of Columbia. It is well known, however, that there are several important appropriation bills, including among others the Army and the naval appropriation bills, which have not yet been considered and, as everybody knows, which should be enacted into law before the 1st of July. For that reason, and following out the suggestion of the Speaker and the majority leader, as chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia I shall not ask the House to-day to consider the District bills reported and on the calendar, although there are two bills which the committee would be glad to have the House consider.

I would like, however, to take advantage of this opportunity to say that I hope after the supply bills are passed the regular District days, the second and fourth Mondays of each month, will be used for the consideration of District legislation. To that end I am assured of the cooperation of the Speaker and the majority leader. For the present it is perhaps as important to the District as to anyone that the supply bills should be passed without any unnecessary delay.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering H. R. 5227, making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering H. R. 5227, the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. KAHN. Pending that, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate continue until adjournment to-day; that the time be equally divided between the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] and myself.

The SPEAKER. And the gentleman asks unanimous consent that general debate be continued until adjournment to-day, the time to be divided, one half to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT]. Is there objection?

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand the gentleman's request is that general debate be carried on to-day without any agreement as to limitation?

Mr. KAHN. Until adjournment to-day, and that the time be equally divided between the gentleman from Alabama and myself.

Mr. DENT. May I ask the gentleman from California what the program is for to-morrow?

Mr. KAHN. I am advised that it is probable that the railroad deficiency bill may come in to-morrow.

Mr. DENT. And the Army appropriation bill will be set aside to-morrow?

Mr. KAHN. I understand so.

Mr. DENT. Will Calendar Wednesday be set aside and then the Army bill resumed on Wednesday?

Mr. MONDELL. We hope so.

Mr. KAHN. I understand that the gentleman from Alabama would like to finish his remarks in general debate on Wednesday, or when the Army bill is again taken up. I shall ask that general debate close immediately after the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama on Wednesday.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But we have not yet done away with Calendar Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that the gentleman amend his request so that the gentleman from Alabama may conclude his remarks on the next day when the Army bill is taken up. It might not be taken up Wednesday.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why does not the gentleman ask unanimous consent now to dispense with the business on Calendar Wednesday?

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I make that request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the business on Calendar Wednesday next be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, what is there on the calendar?

The SPEAKER. Only one or two bills.

Mr. MONDELL. There are two bills reported by the District of Columbia Committee, one having to do with appointing a commission to study the water question and the other refers to game birds.

Mr. GARNER. Has not the daylight-saving bill been reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce?

The SPEAKER. It is not yet reported.

Mr. GARD. Further reserving the right to object, how much of to-day does the gentleman from California intend to consume? What time will the committee rise?

Mr. KAHN. I hope to rise not later than 5.30.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Reserving the right to object for the purpose of making the situation clear, is it intended that general debate will have closed at the adjournment this afternoon, with the exception of the reservation of time for the gentleman from Alabama, to conclude when the Army bill is next resumed?

Mr. KAHN. That is my understanding. How much time will the gentleman from Alabama consume in his remarks in general debate?

Mr. DENT. Not to exceed one hour, and I hope not over 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California to dispense with business on Calendar Wednesday?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that general debate be concluded and finished to-day, except one hour reserved for the gentleman from Alabama when the bill is next taken up. Is there objection?

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I did not understand the request to be that way. I would like to state to the gentleman from California that I understood from the conversation we had this morning that we would not undertake to close debate to-day, but would run on and make an agreement to close debate on Wednesday.

Mr. KAHN. The understanding was that we would conclude general debate to-day, except as to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, would the gentleman permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT. If the gentleman would simply ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate be equally divided, one-half to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT], these other matters would take care of themselves.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit me, in addition to that there must be some understanding as to how long general debate is to continue.

Mr. GARRETT. They do not seem to be able to reach any agreement as to that. It is not necessary to agree that general debate shall run during the day. If they want it to run, it will run. All that is necessary for them to do is to agree on a division of the time, one-half to be controlled by each.

Mr. KAHN. That is all we are trying to do.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. My understanding is that the gentleman from California desires unanimous consent that general debate shall continue on the Army appropriation bill for to-day and for an hour when the bill shall again be taken up for consideration, and that the time for general debate be equally divided between the gentleman from Alabama and himself.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not think that is a fair agreement.

Mr. DENT. That is not the agreement.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The gentleman from Alabama ought to be permitted to conclude his remarks, whenever he makes his speech, and not be limited to one hour.

Mr. KAHN. That was the suggestion of the gentleman himself.

Mr. DENT. But that was not the understanding that I had with the gentleman from California. The understanding I had with the gentleman from California over the telephone was that we would run on to-day with general debate and that we would fix the closing of general debate on Wednesday.

Mr. KAHN. My understanding was that the gentleman would not be ready to make his remarks to-day, because he had been absent from the city and had not been able to scrutinize the bill.

Mr. DENT. That is true. I have not had a chance to read it yet. I got it only an hour and a half ago.

Mr. KAHN. I suggest that we conclude general debate to-day, with the exception of the gentleman from Alabama, and that the gentleman from Alabama may have time to conclude his remarks on Wednesday.

Mr. DENT. Does the gentleman from California say that he did not have the understanding with me that we would fix the time for concluding debate Wednesday instead of to-day?

Mr. KAHN. I suggest that as to the gentleman from Alabama, I was willing to conclude debate on Wednesday. That was my understanding.

Mr. DENT. I did not understand the gentleman from California to limit it to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. GARNER. Why not talk to-day and close the time for debate on Wednesday?

Mr. KITCHIN. Do I understand it is proposed to take up the railroad appropriation bill to-morrow?

Mr. KAHN. That is my understanding.

Mr. KITCHIN. And that this bill should be continued on Wednesday?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; after to-day.

Mr. GARNER. I think we better go on for to-day and close up general debate on Wednesday.

Mr. KAHN. Then I modify my request to this effect: That we continue with general debate upon this bill to-day until the hour of adjournment, and that the time be equally divided between the gentleman from Alabama and myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand that would not limit general debate to to-day?

The SPEAKER. No. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think we ought to be able at this time to determine the length of general debate upon this bill. We have six bills to pass, six important bills, before the 1st day of July. One day of general debate on a single bill is very liberal under the circumstances. In addition to that, the House is perfectly willing to give the gentleman from Alabama opportunity to speak for an hour after the close of this day's general debate on Wednesday. It seems to me that is a very liberal arrangement. I can not understand why the gentleman is not satisfied.

Mr. DENT. If the gentleman will yield, I will state why I am not satisfied. I notified the chairman of this committee, with whom I have always had the most cordial relations, I could not possibly be present Friday and Saturday of last week. We finished the hearings on the bill late Wednesday evening. We started the preparation of the bill on Thursday. We spent the entire day on Thursday undertaking to prepare the bill. It was not finished. I had to leave here Friday morning and was gone two days. When I returned I saw in the newspapers that the bill would be taken up on Tuesday. Immediately this morning I undertook to get in touch with the situation, and found, very much to my surprise, that the bill would be taken up to-day. I understand that the gentleman from California made the statement in the RECORD Saturday afternoon—and I have read the RECORD—that he hoped to take the bill up on Monday. I was not able to get a copy of the bill until about half past 10 o'clock this morning, and I find that although the bill which was passed in the last session of the last Congress was the basis for the consideration of this bill, yet the amount of the bill has been reduced by something like $400,000,000. I have not had the opportunity to consider where those reductions occur. I notice from the newspapers that they have reduced the pay of the Army, the transportation of the Army, and the subsistence of the Army—three items which I think it might be unwise to reduce. I do not say that the committee has not reported a bill that I shall not be satisfied with, but I want an opportunity to investigate it, and I think I am making a reasonable request.

Mr. HAMILTON. I can not understand why the gentleman objects to the arrangement made when he said——

Mr. DENT. Oh, but I can not investigate this proposition and sit here upon the floor of this House while debate is going on all the time.

Mr. BAER. When does the gentleman want to speak?

Mr. HAMILTON. I understood the gentleman to say he would not want more than 30 minutes, and thought that he could easily finish within an hour.

Mr. DYER. When does the gentleman desire the time?

Mr. DENT. Of course, the gentleman from California has very kindly consented for me to close general debate on the bill, and I do not want the time until then.

Mr. DYER. Well, Wednesday?

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman permit me to answer his question?

Mr. DYER. I will yield.

Mr. DENT. I have called the minority members of the committee together this morning to know how much time they wanted and to ascertain if they were prepared to go on to-day, and not one of them was aware of the fact the bill was going to be taken up to-day, and they were not prepared to go on.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will yield, the gentleman is to be given all day to-morrow to prepare, and the next day he is to make his speech, and that ought to be satisfactory.

Mr. DENT. I will say to the gentleman from Wyoming that so far as I am personally concerned that is satisfactory, but it is not satisfactory to the other members of the minority who have not had a chance to prepare what they have to say on the bill.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, just briefly replying to the statement of the gentleman from Alabama, the committee reduced the estimates he spoke of because we agreed to appropriate for an Army of 400,000 men and 22,149 officers. The estimate submitted to the committee contemplated an Army of 509,000 men, as the gentleman well knows, and when you cut the Army by 109,000 you can cut appropriations for pay, subsistence, and transportation in proportion.

Mr. QUIN. Will the gentleman be able to have the hearings printed?

Mr. KAHN. The hearings will be printed in ample time, so that when the bill is taken up under the five-minute rule they will be in the hands of Members. I want to say to the gentleman that the hearings are printed as speedily as we get them back from the War Department, and they will all be ready by the time we begin debate under the five-minute rule.

Mr. QUIN. But they will not be here to-day, and gentlemen who speak to-day will not have the advantage of the hearings?

Mr. KAHN. Well, I imagine——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order. I do not think we ought to delay this question any longer.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is, is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California that general debate continue until adjournment to-day, the time to be divided equally between the gentleman from California and the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming objects.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move that general debate conclude to-day, except for one hour for the gentleman from Alabama——

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order against the motion.

Mr. KITCHIN. I desire to state to the gentleman that he can not do that now; he has to go into the Committee of the Whole and have some debate, and then come back into the House.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 5227, the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 5227, the Army appropriation bill, with Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5227) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill may be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The time is to be equally divided between the gentleman from California and the gentleman from Alabama——

SEVERAL MEMBERS. No.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRISP. I would like to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that there was no agreement as to who would control the time.

Mr. KAHN. No; there was no agreement.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stands corrected.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, happily the great World War, so far as the fighting is concerned, has come to an end. But I take it that so long as the world goes round and so long as human nature is constituted as it is there will continue to be wars and therefore our country for its own protection must continue to maintain a Military Establishment worthy of the American people. [Applause.] I can remember when, in 1916, Congress was considering the national defense act and the allied nations had been struggling with a powerful and relentless foe for almost two years, I offered on this floor an amendment to that bill which authorized the President of the United States to increase our Regular Army to 250,000 men. That amendment was substantially voted down in this House. That amendment was offered, as I now recall it, in the latter part of April or the early part of May, 1916, about nine months before the Imperial Government of Germany served her notice on us that she would sink and destroy ruthlessly our merchant vessels if they dared to cross certain lines on the Atlantic Ocean which Germany herself drew and which, under international law, we had an absolute right to cross at our will. Nine months before Germany served that notice on us I tried to increase our Army to 250,000 men. It is my belief that Germany served that notice because she knew we were helpless as a nation, because she knew that we were not ready to defend our rights, and because she knew it would take months for us to get ready in case she attempted to interfere with our commerce on the high seas.

In traveling through Europe recently I saw the graves of thousands of American boys who had been killed on the battle fields of France.

At Romagne, in the northern part of the Meuse-Argonne battle field, our labor troops were digging trenches where 26,000 Americans are to sleep the everlasting sleep. At Suresnes, just outside of Paris, I saw a cemetery where 3,000 Americans will rest until the judgment day. I was not able to go to the cemetery at Thiaucourt where those who died in the St. Mihiel battle are to find a resting place. But all around Belleau Woods, and near Vaux, near Chateau-Thierry, near Soissons, and near Cantigny there are graveyards where rest the remains of American soldiers killed in this war. I was told by the officers of the Medical Department that 206,000 Americans have given their blood and many of them their limbs as the result of wounds received in the battles in which they participated.

I know that we have incurred indebtedness to the extent of $34,000,000,000, $10,000,000,000 of which represents loans to the cobelligerent Nations. I maintain that if we had been prepared on the 31st of January, 1917, if Congress had voted for my amendment to increase the Army to 250,000 men, this cost of life and blood and treasure would have been saved to the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. ASWELL. Does the gentleman think that 250,000 men would have bluffed Germany at that time?

Mr. KAHN. I firmly believe 250,000 men at that time would have prevented the German Government from making their demands upon us then.

Mr. ASWELL. That is merely a matter of opinion.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman knows full well that all through this war the hope of the German Emperor and his people was that they would be able to defeat the Allies before we could get ready.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. KAHN. I can not yield just now.

Mr. BLACK. Just for a question?

Mr. KAHN. I can not yield just now.

Now, the question, therefore, that confronts us is this: Will we in the future run along as we have been running in the past, drifting, waiting, until something happens before we take action to prepare our country for possible emergencies? I have said repeatedly on this floor that no nation is the sole arbiter of its own destinies. No man can repeat that statement too often. It ought to sink deep into the minds of all Americans.

Take the case of little Belgium. In July, 1914, the people of Belgium were contented, prosperous, and happy. They had nothing to do with the assassination of the Archduke of Austria, that took place at Sarajevo. It did not concern them. They paid little attention to it. They went on about their business. Suddenly, as if a bolt from the blue sky had stricken them, they found their territory invaded, their cities bombarded, their inhabitants killed, and their country devastated. That war was not of their seeking; it was not of their choosing; and yet they were forced into it.

And take our own situation. The American people did not want to go into this war. They tried to avoid it. They did avoid it for several years. The President of the United States was elected for a second term on the slogan of "He kept us out of war." We were peacefully attending to our own affairs when suddenly, on the night of the 31st of January, 1917, our ambassador in Berlin was sent for, was given a map by the German chancellor, and was told that he should communicate with his own country and tell the people of that country that at midnight Germany would sink our ships, as I detailed a moment ago.

That came as a terrific shock to us. Congress was then in session. Congress is the war-declaring body. The President can not declare war. We were in session for practically five weeks after that. Germany did not carry out her threat, and we hoped that we might still avoid the struggle. But after Congress had adjourned, after the Members had gone home, she did carry out her threat. She sunk our ships.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I can not yield now. She sunk our ships, she drowned our people, and then the President called Congress together in an extraordinary session. In a ringing message he asked that we pass a resolution that a state of war existed, which Congress promptly did. That is how we got into the war. But some of us have constantly been saying ever since that we went to war "to fight for humanity" and "to make the world safe for democracy" and other altruistic and idealistic purposes. These were only incidental. They were not the cause of the war, and it is time that we state the cause properly. We went to war to protect American rights. [Applause.] The President stated about that time that in the event that Germany should carry out her threats against our commerce he would ask from Congress authority to use the national power to protect American citizens engaged in peaceful and lawful errands on the high seas. Germany carried out her threats. The President did ask for the authority. Congress promptly voted to give it to him. I hope that at no time in the history of our country will the American people become so supine or so craven that they will not fight to maintain their rights as a great nation. [Applause.] We won the war. We need not blush to say it. We need not apologize for saying it.

I remember when the war resolution was passed France and England shortly after sent their war commissions over here. I recall a dinner at the home of Mr. Henry White, in this city, at which Marshal Joffre and Mr. Viviani, of the French Republic, were present. Marshal Joffre straightforwardly told us the situation. There were about 20 Members of the Senate and House present on that occasion. He spoke frankly to this effect:

We are at the end of our resources. The morale of our armies and of our people is low. We know that you are in the war, and so do the people of France. But we have been led to believe that it will take a year before you can get your soldiers to the other side. I beg of you see to it that one division of your Regular Army troops is sent immediately. We need them to revive our waning morale. If the soldiers of France and of England see your troops on the soil of France, it will give them courage to withstand the enemy until you can come over in force. The situation is serious; is exceedingly precarious. Do not wait until you have trained the men of your conscripted army. That will take too long. But your Regular Army men have already had the training that has established their morale. We can teach them trench fighting in two or three months behind the lines. But send them to us if you want to save the situation.

That was his plea. That was his appeal. He spoke for the French Government, and he spoke for the people of France, when he spoke to those Members of Congress as he did. The administration was deeply impressed by his plea. They met his wishes, and they prepared to send a division of Regular Army men to France as speedily as possible.

That was the situation, gentlemen, in Europe when we entered the conflict. I traveled into Belgium in March—at the end of March. I saw the devastated cities of Nieuport and Ypres and Dixmude and St. Julien. All that is left of St. Julien is a signboard with the name of the city printed on it. There is not a building or a portion of a building left. No man could go through that devastated area without becoming impressed with the wonderful valor and the splendid fortitude of the soldiers of Belgium and England, who held that sector during almost four years of war. [Applause.] Belgium had opened the sluice gates of her dikes. She permitted the waters to cover her land. The trenches, which in some places were not more than 50 feet apart, were constructed above the water. The men held the area, as I have stated, for four years. If they had given way at any time the Germans would undoubtedly have reached Calais, and the history of the war might have been different; for if German troops had occupied that port on the Channel and England had been unable to use it for sending supplies and men across the narrow strait, it would have made a tremendous difference in England's ability to meet the enormous requirements that were made of her in that sector of Belgium.

And just at this point to show incidentally how our American Army was made up, I want to recite a little experience that occurred at Dixmude, in southwestern Belgium. There is not a thing left of the town, not a habitable home. But one enterprising couple has come back and has built a little wooden shack which they use as a little coffee house. They sell coffee to the individuals who might be interested in visiting that section. The couple found out that we were Americans. They spoke French. I managed to get along with them as well as I could with the little French I know, and finally the wife said to me, "Come here; I have had four boys in this war; I want to show you something." Then she opened the door of her adjoining room, and there occupying the place of honor was a picture of an American soldier. She said, "Three of my boys have fought with the Belgian Army. The other boy enlisted in Montana and is fighting with your Americans." [Applause.]

We heard a great deal during the war about German atrocities in Belgium. I tried to verify those stories. I was told frankly that such as did occur happened in the early days of the war. But there is no doubt that the Germans deliberately looted Belgium and rendered her incapable of starting up her factories immediately upon the conclusion of peace. The King's secretary, Mr. Gerard, and a member of the Belgian Parliament, Mr. Boël, who had been tried with Burgomaster Max, of Brussels, and convicted by the German authorities and imprisoned for two years and a half in Germany, took me to his extensive plant at Louviere, which was not in the fighting area; in fact, it was some distance away from any place where fighting had been going on. It was a steel works. The owner had employed 3,000 mechanics and laborers at the works before the war. The Germans had stolen and removed every bit of machinery that had been in the place. And then, in order to make the wreckage all the more complete, they deliberately dynamited the cement foundations on which the machinery had rested. I heard from Belgian officials that the Belgian population, by reason of the situation in which they found themselves, have become more or less pauperized. They depend upon the charity of the world. They have had no work for some years. In the streets of their cities you can see to-day large aggregations of men and women in idleness talking with each other. They can not go back to work because the factories and mills and workshops are closed. The people who own them have not the means to put in new machinery, which at present would cost them two or three times more than it cost when it was purchased originally. That is one of the difficulties that the peace commissioners at Paris have to deal with. There are so many angles to this thing that we can not be surprised at what seems to us interminable delay in formulating definitive terms of peace.

When our troops began to arrive in Europe the English high command and the French high command wanted to use our soldiers as replacement divisions and depot divisions. In other words, if the French or the English had a thousand or two thousand men killed in an engagement, Americans were to be put into their units to fill up the places of those who had fallen. To the credit of Gen. Pershing be it said that from the start he fought for an American Army in Europe. [Applause.] And to the credit of President Wilson and Secretary Baker, they supported him constantly in this desire. [Applause.] The situation at one time became exceedingly tense. The French and the English both were still insisting that we must go in as replacement troops, and then I am told that the commander in chief of our forces emphatically said that we would fight as an American Army if we fought at all. [Applause.] And both Gen. Haig and Gen. Foch finally yielded.

When the Germans pressed down from the Aisne in May and drove everything before them on their great drive for Paris, Gen. Pershing immediately sent three American divisions to fight under Gen. Mangin, the French commander of that sector, in an effort to try to stay the German advance. The first division had been in that area for some little time. They had started out to make the first attempt of an American unit to capture and then to hold the captured German territory.

The attempt was made at Cantigny, I think, on the 25th of May, 1918. An artillery barrage preceded the onslaught of our infantry. It cleared, as far as was possible, the area in front of our troops, and I was told by some of those who participated in that fight that they met with little resistance in sweeping across the narrow valley and going up the little hill on which Cantigny is located. They took the town and held it. Then the German forces sent their shock troops against our men in counterattacks. During the succeeding three days the Germans made seven of these counterattacks. They had been told by their commanders that they must break the morale of the American troops. The best soldiers of Germany tried it at Cantigny and failed. [Applause.] That gave courage to all the allied nations. That inspired a sentiment in our own men that we could defeat Germany at her own game. [Applause.]

Right after that the German hordes came down and seized the territory, which is almost on a line from Soissons to Chateau-Thierry, including the famous Belleau Woods and Vaux. The Second Division was not then in the fighting area, but the men of that division were immediately rushed up into the area. They were brought up in motor trucks. Everything that could be utilized to bring our men to the front was rushed into the service. That led to the statement which gained considerable currency that the French people were making a charge to the Americans for bringing our troops to the front to save, among other things, the Republic of France. We heard it over here. I heard it in Europe, and therefore I thought it incumbent upon myself to investigate the matter. I found it was true.

They did make charges for the use of their camions, as they call them, but it was under a mutual agreement with our country that whenever we used their vehicles we would pay for their use, and whenever the French used our vehicles France would pay us for their use. So there was nothing wrong about it in any way, shape, or manner, and these stories about France charging us when we were defending French territory ought to be buried in oblivion once and for all. [Applause.]

What I do believe, and what I think history will give us credit for, is that the third division of the American troops, especially the Thirty-eighth Infantry Regiment at Mézy, near the Surmalin River, just where it empties into the bend of the Marne, east of Chateau-Thierry, actually was the organization that stopped the Germans in their advance and turned the tide of battle so that the cobelligerent forces could begin the offensive instead of fighting as we had been doing theretofore—on the defensive. [Applause.]

That battle occurred on the 15th of July. The Thirty-eighth Regiment of Infantry were in line on the south bank of the Marne. They were to be protected on their right by a French regiment and on the left by the Thirtieth Regiment of Infantry of our own forces. When this great onslaught was made by the German forces it was found that the Thirtieth, on the left of the Thirty-eighth, had retired a little. It was found that the French regiment had retreated. Col. McAlexander, of the Thirty-eighth, had planted his men not due east and west as the lay of the land would seem to have indicated was the best for his forces but to protect his right flank he had thrown them into position in a northwesterly and southeasterly direction. The men of the Thirty-eighth were defending three sides of their front at one time. Those men remained at their posts for 16 hours without intermission, and it was their proud boast and is the proud boast of all Americans that of the great German horde that had come down to cross the Marne on their way to Paris on that occasion not one dead German soldier could be found south of the little railroad track that ran along the valley of the Surmalin about 400 yards south of the Marne River.

The Germans never reached that advanced position at that point on account of the wonderful courage and the matchless daring of those American soldiers, who prevented their crossing the Marne. [Applause.] It is a bright page in American history. But what I fear is that somebody will again rise up and say that you can call a million men to arms in this country overnight and defeat the trained troops of some mighty, warlike people. Let me remind you that it took us 13 months to get ready; 13 months before we could accomplish that. It was not done overnight. It was the work of many days and many months spent in the trenches and the camps in training. Indeed, we were singularly fortunate in this war that France and England held the lines against the enemy until we were ready to take our part in the titanic struggle. [Applause.]

After that second battle of the Marne, the whole tide of affairs turned. That battle occurred, as I said, on the 15th of July. On the 18th Marshal Foch ordered an advance along the entire front on the part of the allied nations and our forces. That continued successfully for days. We drove the enemy constantly from the 15th day of July until the end of the war.

Great operations during that period were largely under the American command. The Battle of St. Mihiel was planned by the Americans. It was carried through by Gen. Pershing and his forces. And a very interesting sidelight on that battle might be stated at this time. I was told by men in whom I have every confidence that about the 2d or 3d of September the statement was made in a public restaurant in Paris that the Americans were going to start a drive on St. Mihiel on the 10th of September. The statement was made openly and publicly. At that time spies were everywhere, and it was known that the Germans would get the information. Gen. Pershing immediately remonstrated. He protested against the open discussion of the war plans of the Americans or of any of the allied nations.

Thereupon the Americans used a bit of strategy. The military attaché at the capital of one of the neutral States was sent for to come to general headquarters. He was told that it was the purpose of the American command to throw the Germans off the track and that he would be expected to carry out his part of the program. They hurriedly prepared the plan of an attack near Belfort, in southwestern France. That plan was given to this military attaché, who was told to get it into the hands of the enemy. He returned to his capital, gave it to one of the younger officers serving under him, with instructions to lose it in a certain place where many individuals suspected of German leanings nightly congregated. The young man carried out this plan to perfection. He went to the place indicated. After chatting most pleasantly with some of the suspects he quietly excused himself for a moment and incidentally dropped the papers out of his pocket. He went outside of the room and in about two minutes returned with a look of great distress on his face. Feeling his pockets and looking furtively about he said, "Did anyone see a paper that I dropped?" Of course nobody had seen it. Then he went on to tell how important that paper was and that his personal future was involved in the recovery of that paper. He said he would probably be court-martialed and his entire career ruined if it were not forthcoming. Of course it was not forthcoming and he left the place. Several days after that Germany sent four divisions to defend her front near Belfort, and a few days after that, not on the 10th of September but on the 12th of September, the battle of St. Mihiel began.

The Germans found that not only could the Americans fight, not only would the Americans fight, but they could employ strategy in their plans just as the Germans had employed it during all the years they had been preparing for this war. [Applause.]

The salient of St. Mihiel was won in 27 hours. For four years it had been held by the enemy. Attempts had been made time and again to take it. France sacrificed something like 50,000 men in trying to take one spur of the salient known as Les Esparges. They took it and lost it again, and 50,000 of their men bit the dust in the attempt.

We started off on that attack with a great force of Artillery. We advanced over the territory successfully. Every objective was gained right from the start.

In the meantime the next battle—the Meuse-Argonne fight—had been projected. It was intended that our Artillery should be rushed up to that sector without delay. It was intended that we should go in and finish the work at St. Mihiel with our Infantry. Suddenly our Signal Corps men heard a wireless station in operation in the salient. The Germans had not all been driven out. I mention this merely to show you that every branch of our service performed its part efficiently and effectively for the honor of American arms. [Applause.] They gave notice, and we drove out the remnant of the Germans that were there without much trouble.

Soon after that the Meuse-Argonne fight began. It was started by a simultaneous bombardment coming from the throats of 2,275 pieces of artillery. That bombardment kept up for some hours. Any man who goes over that field, any man who traverses that terrain for any distance, will realize the magnitude of the great task the American forces undertook. It took us nearly a month to clean up that area. We got to Montfaucon, a point of vantage near the center of the field, without much difficulty. We lost a great many men. We took Montfaucon, which seemed an impregnable fortress. Then we went beyond it. We reached and crossed the Kremhilde Stellung, a part of the Hindenburg line which the Germans had felt could never be taken by mortal man. We went through it as if it did not exist. [Applause.]

We had some tanks helping us in that drive. The Germans were mortally afraid of the tanks. I found some of their literature on the tank near Moraigne Ferme, north of Verdun. They said, in effect, "Do not be afraid of the tank. It can not travel as fast as you can. [Laughter.] There is nothing to be afraid of. Just wait until it gets pretty close up and then shoot at a vulnerable part and you can accomplish your purpose."

The mere fact that they gave out that kind of propaganda was an indication to me that they were, in fact, afraid of the tanks. And during all the war Germany was never able to manufacture a good, serviceable tank.

I saw some other pieces of their literature and some of them were pretty blood-thirsty. I saw one in particular which referred to the failure of the cobelligerent nations to accept Austria's request for peace. In that leaflet they said, in effect, that "the Allies do not intend to accept our request for the cessation of hostilities; they have refused to listen to peace terms. It must be evident to you that they intend the thorough annihilation and destruction of the people of the Central Empires. Do not show any mercy to these enemies. Shoot to kill or to mortally wound." Those circulars were tacked on the wall of the farmhouse which we afterwards took, and when they retreated from that place they were found on the walls of that building.

After we had won the battle of the Meuse-Argonne and when we were preparing to move onward toward the German territory the enemy asked for an armistice. It was granted. And even then the insidious propaganda against Americans in Europe was going on.

We all know what the situation was when the armistice came. France and England had been in the war over four years. They had suffered enormous losses. Their people were war weary and they welcomed an opportunity to agree upon a cessation of hostilities.

A very estimable French lady, whom I know very well and have known for years, told me that she had heard that the reason why the Allies did not follow up the victory after the Meuse-Argonne was because President Wilson had called a halt, and that neither France nor England would dare to go on after that.

Now, that was insidious propaganda meant to injure the good name and fame, in my humble opinion, of the American people. I do not know who is responsible for it, but I do know that the longer we remain in Europe the more slanders of that sort will be sent forth and the worse the situation will grow. [Applause.]

If I had my way, as I have said repeatedly, every American soldier, except military attachés, would speedily be taken out of Europe. [Applause.] If we had some tangible things to protect in the treaty of peace, perhaps we would have to see to it that its terms are carried out. But we went into the war not seeking territory, not seeking indemnities, not for revenge, not seeking anything but the acknowledgment of American rights on the high seas. [Applause.]

Oh, I could spend a long time in taking you with me through the "leave areas" of France, where our men are given an opportunity to get a breath of fresh air and to see the land which many of them had visited for the first time. I want to say here that I have heard a great many criticisms at the hands of soldiers and others about the welfare associations. But no man could have gone into the "leave areas" of Europe and have witnessed the kindness, the consideration, and the open hospitality that was showered on our men through the instrumentality of the Y. M. C. A. and the Knights of Columbus and the Salvation Army and the Jewish Welfare Board and all those activities without admitting that they were doing a great work for the young men of America. [Applause.] I glory in what they were able to accomplish for our soldiers and for having brought a great deal of happiness into the hearts of these troops of the Republic who were thousands of miles away from kith and kin and who probably otherwise would not have enjoyed many of the creature comforts that came to them through the instrumentality of these organizations.

I would like to go with you through the ports of embarkation and show you the wonderful work that was accomplished in a comparatively few months through the skill and the ability of American engineers and American troops. I would like to take you through the stations of the service of supplies, those immense warehouses which held the material that was essential for the men at the front. Oh, we frequently hear sneers about the men who stayed behind the battle lines in the services of supply. They, too, performed valiant service. I want to say that if those men had not performed their duty as effectively and as efficiently as they did, the men in the fighting line could not have performed their services either. It was an important work and it was mighty well done, and the Nation owes those men just as great a debt of gratitude as it does the soldiers who fought in the ranks at the front.

At Tours there was a German prison camp of about 4,000 men. All through the war there had been much speculation as to the age of the German soldiers. I remember the debate on the floor of this House very well when we were passing the man-power bill, which proposed to take the men between 18 and 45 years of age for our Army. It was said in that debate that even Germany had not taken her 18-year-old boys. At Tours I found some German prisoners who were 18 years of age at the time I visited the camp. I asked them how long they had been in the service before the armistice was signed. They said they had been in for nine months. The armistice had been in effect for six months at the time I visited the camp, so that those men could not have been more than 17 years old when they went into the German Army. One of their noncommissioned officers stated frankly that in the closing years of the war Germany had accepted boys of 15 years of age as volunteers, and boys of 16 years as volunteers, but had actually drafted them at 17. He said that during the war they did not want such information to get out, but now the war is over there could be no harm in telling it at this time.

We hear much of the German propaganda literature that was disseminated in our own ranks by the enemy. We likewise disseminated our literature in the ranks of the Germans. One of the leaflets that were scattered rather plentifully stated just what the American soldiers were receiving in the way of rations. The list was printed with considerable care and was dropped into the German lines from our airplanes. American officers told me that toward the closing days of the war when large numbers of Germans were surrendering they would pull from the sleeves of their coats copies of these leaflets, especially those showing the food they were to get. They would point to it as if to say, "Make good on that." [Laughter.] So that, at least, one kind of our propaganda work seems to have been a success.

After the armistice, when the men in all countries began to return to their homes, new troubles began to beset the world. The peace council met in Paris in January. It soon became evident that the world was looking upon us as the Lady Bountiful of the universe. All kinds of propositions were submitted. One was that all the allied nations were to throw their indebtedness into a general pool, and that the nation which had been in the war the shortest length of time and had lost the fewest men should bear the greatest burden of the indebtedness.

Then there was another proposition: By reason of their helplessness Belgium and France should get money immediately from Germany to restore conditions in these war-ridden countries, so that their people could at once begin to work. How authoritative the source of the information was I do not know; but I learned that a proposition had been put forth that Germany was to pay the demands at once, and was to issue a series of bonds, and that the United States should guarantee the payment of the bonds. [Laughter.] Many such propositions of course were to be expected. It was inevitable. But one thing is sure, absolutely certain, and that is that the people of Europe do not understand our plain, blunt way of doing things, and we do not understand the intrigues and the hatreds and jealousies of the people of Europe. I saw a map the other day, a very recent map of Europe. It showed the various countries and the various races that inhabit the various sections of the various countries. Twenty-seven different well-defined races and peoples are depicted on that map. They differ racially, they differ ethnologically, they do not speak the same languages. They are poles apart, and they hate each other with an unholy hatred. Yet we are trying to mix up in this maelstrom and fix boundary lines for those peoples! Do you think we can do it? Do you believe it can be successfully done? I do not believe so. I called on Mr. Hoover the very day I left Paris; I think it was the 12th of May. He showed me on the map of Europe where in 17 different places men under arms were fighting and killing each other. And this while the peace council was sitting at Paris, trying to bring peace to all the world!

We have great problems ahead of us; great problems. The fixing of the boundary line at Fiume has brought on a great deal of discontent right in this country. Our population is made up of people from every portion of the globe. They are ready to fight for this country, this land of their adoption, whenever our country calls. Many of them, I believe, way down in their hearts have lurking a bit of love for the land in which they were born, but if a struggle should come between this country and that land, they would be ready to march under the flag of the Republic against the very land in which they first saw the light of day. [Applause.]

But in these questions of boundaries their heart is really with their native land. And why should we, interfering in European politics [applause on the Republican side] and European affairs, throw this apple of discord among any part of our American citizens. [Applause on the Republican side.] We have an equally distressing situation with respect to China and Japan. The Chinese for a long time have looked upon America as their one true friend among the nations of the earth. This is practically the only country that never tried to despoil her of her territory. We have held out the hand of friendship to her on many an occasion. But the Chinese complain most bitterly now that we have given over to Japan the province of Shantung. True, they say that Japan asserts that it is only for 15 years. But they call attention to what Japan said about Korea in 1904 when she went to war with Russia, in a rescript issued by the Emperor of Japan at that time; that she intended to maintain the independence and integrity of Korea. She also entered into treaties with Korea which set those things forth in so many words. Then, year after year, she began to encroach upon the independence of Korea until in 1910 she swallowed Korea and deposed her emperor. The Chinese say, "Can you Americans place any dependence upon a nation that in the past has violated sacred compacts and that is apt to do it again in the case of this richest part of the Chinese Empire, the part that is dear to us because it is the birthplace of our great teacher, Confucius?" These are all problems that confront us. These are all questions which the American people ought to discuss thoroughly before the treaty of peace is ratified. I hope that that treaty will be published in full before the Senate acts——

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield just there?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman will be glad to note that the Senate by a vote of 46 to 24 has ordered the treaty published, which they now have. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. It is exceedingly gratifying to know that, and I thank the gentleman for having given me and the committee that information.

Mr. POU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I do.

Mr. POU. I would like to inquire if the treaty that the Senate has ordered published is what purports to be the stolen copy of the treaty sent over here——

Mr. KAHN. I can not inform the gentleman; I do not know. The first I learned of it was through the information I received just now from the gentleman from Ohio; but I have here a copy of the summary of the conditions of peace which I will vouch for as authentic.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Has not that been published?

Mr. KAHN. I do not know. If it was published, it was published at a time when I was not in this country.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I thought we had all seen that.

Mr. KAHN. But this I secured, and it is undoubtedly authentic.

Mr. KITCHIN and Mr. HARDY of Texas rose.

Mr. KITCHIN. Would it embarrass the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen desiring to interrupt the speaker will address the Chair and secure the speaker's permission.

Mr. KAHN. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. KITCHIN. Would it embarrass the gentleman to say from what source he obtained that summary? I can understand——

Mr. KAHN. I can say to the gentleman this much about it, that I received it at the Hotel Crillon in Paris. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman will permit, I presume more than one person is stopping at that hotel?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, yes; but I can say there was no attempt to withhold these summaries. They were passed to the German delegates to the peace conference——

Mr. KITCHIN. I am informed by a gentleman near me that that has been published.

Mr. KAHN. It probably has. It is a résumé of the treaty itself, and the gentleman has been a legislator for many years, and a good one at that——

Mr. KITCHIN. I admit it.

Mr. KAHN. And he knows that summaries are often vague. I want to say that I saw the treaty of peace, a printed copy of it; it covered 208 printed pages. It was printed in English and in French. It contained 15 different parts. This summary covers 27 pages, so that it takes an average of about 8 pages of the treaty to make 1 page of this.

Mr. KITCHIN. If I may again interrupt the gentleman, I assume the gentleman is going to publish it in the RECORD?

Mr. KAHN. I will publish it in the RECORD; yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would like to see it.

Mr. KAHN. Well, I admit it is interesting, and if the committee will indulge me a few moments I can state a few things about it now. It refers, for instance, to the German cables and their disposition. The details, of course, are not in here. I understand that the German cables have been divided into about 17 different sections. Some of them are used now by the French Government and others by the British Government. There are three or four sections that are not being used by anybody, because they are absolutely worthless to anybody. Now, the disposition of those cables is a most important thing for the United States, and if we do nothing else, I hope this Government will endeavor to make arrangements with some country in Europe whereby we will have a station on the other side of the Atlantic for an European end for an American cable. [Applause.] It is all essential for our commerce if we hope to become that great commercial nation of which we hear so much from so many mouths these days. If we do not have it, every cablegram that is sent from a business firm in Europe to an American manufacturer will pass under the scrutiny of the officials of that Government that controls the European end of the cable.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question, if I may.

Mr. KAHN. I will yield for a brief question.

Mr. JUUL. Does the gentleman think that it is at present a military necessity that letters sent from a neutral country, a country with which we are not at war, should be opened by the British and every piece of trade information that we might want to get at first hand should be known to the British people before we get the information?

Mr. KAHN. I can not tell the gentleman; I do not know under what agreement that is being done.

But I do know that it was done largely while the world was at war; and I believe that every telegram of a business nature that passed between Europe and this country was likewise known to the officials of the countries on the other side of the Atlantic. I do not doubt that the information thus obtained was made use of for the purpose of upbuilding the trade and commerce of those countries. I think that it was freely stated in the British Parliament at the time the censorship was being invoked on American correspondence that the information was being used for the upbuilding of British trade. But I do not know about it personally.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. KAHN. I can not yield further. I can not answer the question. I do not know under what conditions the letters are being opened. I presume our Government is making protests if they are being opened in violation of any agreement; but I assume that there is some agreement.

Now, I notice in this summary, if the gentleman will allow me, that Germany is to restore to the Allies ton for ton their shipping that was destroyed by the Central Powers during the war. This refers to their ships of commerce and even the Allies' fishing trawlers that were destroyed. But the treaty is painfully silent as to the restoration of ship tonnage to any other nation but the Allies. In other words, the Associated Powers, of which the treaty speaks in conjunction with the Allies, are sedulously left out of that section of the treaty. And I honestly believe that a thorough scrutiny of the treaty will enlighten the American people and will enable them to learn many things about which they ought to be enlightened and which they do not know at the present time.

There was much discussion of the league of nations while I was in Europe. There was a difference of opinion over there, just as there is a difference of opinion over here, as to its efficacy as an antidote against future wars.

There was much interest manifested and considerable surprise expressed at the announcement of President Wilson that he would recommend to the Senate that a treaty of alliance should be entered into between the United States and the Republic of France, and also with Great Britain. Many Frenchmen of prominence asked me what I thought of the prospect for such an alliance. I told them frankly that our country had from its birth avoided foreign alliances, and I did not believe that a majority of my countrymen would countenance such treaties now or at any time in the future. From the beginning of our history Americans have been taught that we must avoid entangling alliances. That is a part of our political creed as a Nation. Of course those with whom I discussed the matter doubted my judgment. I am still of the opinion that America will never ratify such treaties. But I have often thought that the mere announcement by the President that he would ask for such treaties was a tacit acknowledgment on his part that the league of nations was not altogether a dependable panacea. If it is to preserve the peace of the world, why the necessity for additional separate alliances with France and England. The mere fact that such alliances are asked for by these countries would indicate to me, at least, that they have not much confidence in the efficacy of the league as a war preventative. And if England, France, and the United States can form a separate alliance, why can not Germany, Russia, and Japan also form an alliance. To me the whole plan seems to be indefinite and vague. Many in Europe, and I believe that most thinking men and women in America, know that the league will not prevent war. In fact many publicists and thinkers believe it will, if anything, tend to bring about wars more frequently.

I am convinced that we ought not to be drawn into controversies concerning this boundary line or that boundary line or the aspirations of this people or that people. We know that Europe is a hell hole of political plotting and intrigue. We know that the statesmen of one European country lie awake at night planning and plotting to get an advantage for their country over some rival country. We know of their jealousies, their rivalries, their hatreds. The league of nations is not going to alter the human emotions of people who for centuries have nursed and cherished these hatreds and jealousies that all too frequently in the past have led to bitter warfare.

Ah, gentlemen, let us stay on our side of the Atlantic Ocean. [Applause.] We have many great problems confronting us. We have a glorious destiny if we will just mind our own business [applause], and not try to regulate the affairs of the universe. I am a nationalist. [Applause.] I believe in my own country, in my own people, in our own Constitution. Our country has stood forth a beacon for the oppressed of every land for over a century. It has inspired the confidence of the world.

I remember standing on the public square in the city of Liege recently. There was a little Belgian boy that came to our little group of Americans. He said in a forceful way: "When I am 20 and 1 years of age, I am going to America." He was only 13 or 14 years old. I said to him, "Why, my boy, do you want to go to America?" He said, "Here we have to work hard, but we have nothing when we are through. Over in America when you work hard you can save a little something and have a little home and a little comfort, and that is more than we get here." And that was only a child; but he had learned to know of the great opportunities and the great advantages and the great benefits that accrue to any man who is honest and industrious and faithful and loyal in America.

I can only say in conclusion to this part of my remarks, that never before did those lines of James Russell Lowell appeal to me as they did when I saw the Statue of Liberty as I sailed up New York Bay:

> Oh, beautiful, my country; * * *
> What were our lives without thee!
> What all our lives to save thee;
> We reck not what we gave thee;
> We do not dare to doubt thee;
> But ask whatever else, and we will dare.

[Applause.]

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from California yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from California yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. QUIN. You spoke of the treaty that is being made in Paris. Could you state whether or not it provides that the Government of the United States will keep soldiers in the Saar Valley or elsewhere in Europe, or for the protection of mandatories, and for how long?

Mr. KAHN. The summary does not state that. It has this provision, however. tI says, in effect, that if Germany for five years carries out faithfully the obligations that are imposed upon her, the troops of the nations occupying German territory will be withdrawn from the Cologne bridgehead and the territory adjacent to it in five years. If for 10 years she carries out her obligations under the treaty, the troops that might be occupying the Coblenz bridgehead and the territory contiguous to it will be withdrawn in 10 years. And if for 15 years she carries out her obligations under the treaty, then all the troops that might be in the Mayence bridgehead or the territory contiguous to it, and in any other part of Germany, will be finally withdrawn after 15 years. And while the summary of the treaty does not indicate what soldiers those troops are to consist of, what forces they are to consist of, we have a right to assume that possibly—I say possibly—we may be called upon to keep some of our troops at Coblenz for the next 10 years.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. QUIN. Will the gentleman yield for another question there?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. QUIN. Would the gentleman favor this House appropriating money to keep American soldiers over there for 10 years after this treaty is signed?

Mr. KAHN. I hope not. I hope every vote in this House will be against such a proposition. [Applause.]

I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. It may be information to the gentleman from California to know that since he began to make his speech, the Senate has adopted a resolution for the publication of the treaty as a whole.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] stated that to the House a few moments ago.

Mr. MADDEN. Very well. I will withdraw it. [Laughter.]

Mr. KAHN. Now, for these reasons, I say, the people of America have a vital interest in knowing what is in this treaty, and I am glad that at the other end of the Capitol an effort is being made to print it in full for the information of the citizens of this Republic. [Applause.]

Now, a few words on the pending bill. I am afraid I have trespassed upon the time of the House too long. But the Committee on Military Affairs felt, in view of the rapid demobilization of our armies, that it would not be necessary at this time to appropriate for a force of 509,000 enlisted men and over 28,000 officers. When the War Department officials came to the committee in January and presented their estimates they frankly told us that they could not tell us how rapidly the Army could or would be demobilized.

The question of shipping and tonnage was then very important but they said they would try to get them back as speedily as possible. Our information at the recent hearing was that the force in Europe by the 1st of July would be materially reduced—considerably below the figures that had been previously estimated.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Has the committee any recent or inside information as to when all the American troops will be withdrawn from Russia, and what they went there for?

Mr. KAHN. The committee, as I recall, was informed that the troops at Archangel were to be brought home at once, and that they are all being withdrawn. The committee was also told that about 8,000 men are in Siberia, and that it was desirable to retain them there so as to maintain the Siberian Railroad open to the allied nations, so that they could take food to the starving people of Russia and Siberia; that that was being done under an international agreement, as I recall, each nation having guaranteed to furnish a certain number of men to maintain that transit across Siberia for that purpose.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have appreciated the thoroughness of the gentleman's most interesting review of the situation in Europe. I also recall that when the gentleman first came back from Europe he submitted to an interview which pleased me very much. His statement of affairs there was clear and lucid. In that interview he stated that he hoped that the Army might be reduced to 100,000 men. This bill makes provision for 400,000 men. The War Department had asked for 500,000 men. I would like to ask the gentleman if he will explain how it is we come to reach 400,000, seeing that there is a demand in the country for the speedy demobilization of the military forces?

Mr. KAHN. Of course the gentleman can readily see that, having appropriated for an average Army of 400,000 men, the number must be largely reduced below that number soon after the middle of the next fiscal year. In other words, at the beginning of the fiscal year the Army will be at its apex, so far as the fiscal year is concerned. There will probably be 700,000 or 800,000 soldiers in our armies on the 1st of July. Probably on the 1st of August that number will have been reduced by 300,000. By the 1st of September it will have been still further reduced, and so the reduction will continue until the end of the fiscal year—that is, until June 30, 1920—at which time I imagine there will not be many more than 200,000 soldiers left in our Army.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman upon just what he bases his suggestion that the Army can be reduced to 100,000 men?

Mr. KAHN. I base that on my own opinion. I have repeatedly said, and I said it in this House even before I went to Europe, that, in my opinion, a country like this could well get along with a Regular Army of 100,000 men if they were to be used as a training cadre for the universal training of American youths between the ages of 18 and 19.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes. The gentleman did couple universal training with his suggestion. But the difference between 100,000 as a peace organization and 400,000 is rather marked.

Mr. KAHN. As I stated before, the language of the bill does not contemplate in any way a standing Army for this coming fiscal year of 1920 of 400,000 men.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It does not contemplate that?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly not. It means an average Army of 400,000 men.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Secretary of War was quoted sometime ago as suggesting that we would probably have all the troops out of Europe, I think, by the 1st of August. I may be inaccurate as to that. It was either the 1st of August or the 1st of September. In view of what the gentleman has said, this new provision for as many as 400,000 men might imply that we are going to be obliged to keep in Europe 200,000 men for an indefinite period, or at least for a period of 10 years. I am speaking in the interest of economy purely, I will say to the gentleman. I am interested in the revenues, and I want to know where we are to get off.

Mr. KAHN. I am also interested in that question; I am interested also in the welfare of my country, as to its Army, and I have always believed in preparedness. But I do not approve now, and never will approve, in this country a standing Army of 400,000 men. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then this suggestion of 400,000 men, to be carried in the bill as presented, is simply in continuation of the war measures, or the emergency that is still upon us?

Mr. KAHN. It is an Army that during this coming fiscal year will average about 400,000 men, being much larger at the beginning of the fiscal year than 400,000, and being considerably less than 400,000 at the end of the year.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Secretary of War asked for 500,000 men.

Mr. KAHN. Five hundred and nine thousand men.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And provision was made in the preceding bill, if I remember, for that number?

Mr. KAHN. Yes. The committee was justified at that time in appropriating for that number. It seemed to the committee that it would not be possible to demobilize our forces as rapidly as they have been brought home and demobilized.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. As the gentleman sees it now, does it look to him as if at the end of 1920 we would have as many as 300,000 men in the Army of the United States?

Mr. KAHN. No; I do not think so. I think at that time we shall have come down to the basis of the volunteer army which was authorized in the closing days of the last session of Congress. We authorized an army of volunteers under the national-defense act which would provide a force of about 175,000 combat troops plus about 50,000 auxiliary troops.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Am I right about this: If we vote for this bill we are voting to reduce the Army 100,000 less than the Secretary of War asked for when the former bill was before the House?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; an average Army of 400,000 men, a 22½ per cent smaller Army than he had asked for at the beginning of 1919.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. So that there is a very distinct cut in this bill?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Louisiana?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee what the committee has done in reference to aviation in connection with preparedness.

Mr. KAHN. The committee has adopted a provision that was in the last bill as it passed the House. The Army appropriation bill was very fully discussed on this floor, and the aviation section in particular. Several statements have been made to the committee. The matter was frankly considered and it was deemed inadvisable in this bill to take up any projects that would seem to indicate the future policy of Congress and of the War Department as to the future of our Army. It was deemed advisable to make this an appropriation bill, and it was deemed necessary to pass it very quickly, because, as we all know, if the 30th of June comes before this bill is enacted into law not a dollar of the money in the Treasury will be available to pay those men who would be discharged on July 1 and thereafter until this bill becomes a law, and give them their final pay and their transportation to their homes. So the committee thought it advisable to let such matters as aviation and ordnance and all those other questions wait for the present until we take up a complete Army reorganization bill.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. I notice that the bill calls for additional pay of 20 per cent.

Mr. KAHN. That is the existing law.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. I have just heard from a soldier in France who says he was paid in French money. He saved up an amount equivalent to $270 in United States money. He can not get away from there without sacrificing $40 exchange, due to some combination of French bankers.

Mr. KAHN. Then he was in a sector where they did business differently from what they did in another sector that I visited. At Brest I went into the treasury building which we have constructed there, and the steamer Leviathan had just brought dozens of cases—enormous cases—filled with United States paper money to pay the troops. They were being paid in new United States bills. If this man got French money, the matter ought to be investigated, because our Government, I take it, never contemplated that any American soldier should have to pay the exchange for converting French money into American money, but, on the other hand, it was intended to give the American soldier the benefit of the exchange if he wanted to change his American money into French money.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. He says that many of the soldiers are paid in the same way, and that they can not get American money. I called the attention of the War Department to it, and they said it was a serious matter, and that thousands of dollars had been lost to our soldiers. They contemplated bringing a bill into Congress; and I want the provision incorporated into this bill to enable these soldiers to be reimbursed where they could not get American money after they had served under our colors over there.

Mr. KAHN. I would want to investigate fully any such statement as to American soldiers in France being paid in French money, when I know that there was plenty of American money over there to pay them.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. For the gentleman's information I will state that all our troops during the war were paid in French currency or Italian currency, wherever they were stationed, and the money which was brought over which the gentleman saw was brought over there to give the men their last pay in Brest before coming home. I will state to the gentleman that the exchange was not fixed by the French bankers, but was fixed by our Treasury Department.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Fifteen per cent?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Whatever it was.

Mr. KAHN. When I left France the exchange was six French francs for one American dollar. At the various places that I visited I was informed that the American soldiers were getting American money.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. They did not get it during the war.

Mr. KAHN. Of course I was not over there during the war.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. They were paid in the currency of the country wherever they happened to be.

Mr. KAHN. If that was the case and the American soldier lost anything on the exchange, I believe this Government owes it to the American soldier to make up his loss in that particular. [Applause.]

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. LITTLE. Twenty years ago American soldiers were paid in American gold. I do not know what the custom is now.

Mr. KAHN. I saw great chests of American money in Brest.

Mr. LITTLE. I have seen thousands of dollars paid out in American gold to our soldiers abroad. I want to ask the distinguished gentleman if I understood him to express the opinion that 100,000 men in our Army would take care of the duties of our Army abroad and also take care of the military training of the boys of 18 to 19?

Mr. KAHN. Of the boys between 18 and 19. I think it can be done.

Mr. LITTLE. And do all the other work?

Mr. KAHN. I think so. It will keep the Army busy; but, for God's sake, let us keep them busy.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. In connection with this matter of exchange I was told in Coblenz that the Army of occupation there had been paid in marks and that the American commissary refused to accept payments for purchases made in the very money which the paymasters of the Army had passed out to the soldiers in payment for their services.

Mr. KAHN. Of course, the mark is a very much depreciated form of currency. One franc is equivalent to two marks now.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. The complaint was that the American soldier was paid in marks and that then the American Quartermaster's Department refused to accept that same money in payment for purchases made by the soldiers.

Mr. KAHN. That certainly should be investigated, and I shall be glad to bring the matter to the attention of the War Department.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I want to ask the chairman of the committee, merely for information, as to the demobilization of the Army. What is the present policy of the War Department with reference to the average Army in this country at the present time? In other words, how many men are they keeping in the various camps as an average Army?

Mr. KAHN. I understand there are in the camps about 400,000 men.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Are they keeping up that average?

Mr. KAHN. It is being kept up because about as many men are returning from Europe daily as are being demobilized, so that the average is being kept up just at present. When our forces fail to come in such numbers from the other side of the Atlantic, the demobilization in our camps undoubtedly will be much greater.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. EMERSON. Has the gentleman studied the bonus that is given by England, France, Canada, and Italy to their discharged soldiers in comparison with ours?

Mr. KAHN. No; I will say frankly that I have not looked into that matter at all.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DENISON. In the course of the hearings on the bill did the Secretary of War express his view as to what our permanent Army should be?

Mr. KAHN. No; he did not. I think the committee and the Secretary had an informal discussion. He frankly stated and the committee frankly told him that in this bill it was not desirable to take up Army reorganization. It was to be an appropriation bill simply, and that later on we would take up the matter of our military policy and Army reorganization.

Mr. DENISON. So there is no legislation in the bill?

Mr. KAHN. No. There are two or three provisos in the bill which, I think, the House will adopt.

Mr. DENISON. Changing existing law?

Mr. KAHN. One proviso changes existing law; that is the one with reference to the purchase of real estate. But there are several provisos which enable the financial officer to give the enlisted man upon certain conditions his final pay, notwithstanding the fact that his papers have been lost or destroyed. We think that it is essential that they should be enacted into law, because instances of this kind occur: While his organization was moving from one place to another along the front, a wagon carrying the records of the organization was struck by a shell and all the papers of that organization were destroyed. Of course, the man should get his money on making a proper affidavit showing that condition.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HAUGEN. To what number will the American Army be reduced, or likely to be reduced, by July?

Mr. KAHN. I think it will be down to the law which Congress enacted in February of this year; that is 175,000 combat troops, plus auxiliaries, which will make a total of approximately 215,000 men.

Mr. HAUGEN. By the 1st of July coming?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, no; I thought the gentleman meant the 1st of July, 1920.

Mr. HAUGEN. I meant the 1st of July next.

Mr. KAHN. I think in the neighborhood of 900,000 men.

Now, I thank the House for its indulgence. If there is no further question, I will yield the floor.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman state whether or not the troops are being removed from Europe to this country with all possible expedition?

Mr. KAHN. I believe the troops are being brought expeditiously from France and from England and various other areas in which our troops have been quartered; but how rapidly they are being brought from the occupied area, the bridgehead at Coblenz and the territory behind it, I do not know.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Let me put the question in this way: Does the gentleman think it is possible to bring any more troops home than are being brought monthly?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Have we more bottoms to bring them in? Where can you get additional bottoms to bring them home in?

Mr. KAHN. I am under the impression that we can take some of our ships that we are building, that are being completed, and put them into the service so as to bring more home.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am speaking of present conditions; you can not put ships into the service until they are completed.

Mr. KAHN. I understand that more tonnage is being put into the service day after day.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Are they bringing home troops?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; I think they are used also as cargo carriers. But I want to say in all frankness and fairness to the gentleman from Virginia that I think the War Department is making every effort to bring home every soldier in France with the facilities it has at its command. [Applause.] I think that is so, but I do not agree with the policy, if that be the policy of the War Department, of keeping troops over there in the occupied territory.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am not speaking of the occupation forces; I am speaking of troops available for transportation. Does the gentleman know, or does he not know, that we are crowding troops on ships coming home so that they not infrequently sleep in shifts?

Mr. KAHN. I have not heard of that. I came over on a very large ship. It was crowded, but I did not hear of anything of that kind.

Mr. MONTAGUE. We have been bringing troops home on some of our warships, have we not?

Mr. KAHN. Comparatively few.

Mr. MONTAGUE. A good many cruisers have been converted into transports, have they not?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; but compared with the great number of troops we have had over there the cruisers do not bring a great many home. All the transports now are manned by the Navy.

I want to say this about the Navy, and probably I should have said it earlier in my remarks: No man can go aboard one of those giant transports like the Leviathan without having the greatest admiration for the American boys who went into the engine rooms and the firerooms of those ships during the war. They went to their posts and served their country when it was exceedingly dangerous to take those positions. A submarine firing a torpedo at one of those ships and perchance sinking it would have sent every young American in the fireroom and in the engine room to the bottom of the sea, I honestly believe. Yet those young men fearlessly and patriotically went to their posts of duty in the face of imminent danger, and I do not hesitate to say that they deserve as much credit as those who fought in the Army. [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. HAUGEN. Recently it was indicated in the press that all but seven divisions, 250,000 men, were to be returned to the United States by the 1st of July, and that all would be released in this country except 150,000 in the camps, which would make a total number of 400,000 in the Army immediately after the 1st of July. What does the gentleman say as to that?

Mr. KAHN. I saw in this morning's paper or yesterday's papers that the War Department had withdrawn all of our combat troops that were in the National Army and the National Guard from Europe; that only regulars were over there at this time. Seven divisions would be in the neighborhood of 250,000 men. Many of those men who have been transferred to regular divisions are really drafted men or men who volunteered for the war. They have a right to be brought home within four months after the signing of the peace treaty. I imagine that the War Department will bring them home. I imagine that they are making every effort to bring them home. The policy of keeping soldiers over there at all is one that is an Executive matter, but voicing the opinion of one legislator in this body I say that I hope every soldier will be brought from Europe not later than the beginning of next October. [Applause.]

I thank the House for its indulgence. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DENT. As I understand there was no agreement made as to a limit of time for general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. That is true. Each gentleman securing the floor will be recognized for one hour.

Mr. KAHN. Will my colleague yield? How much time did I consume?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman used 2 hours and 15 minutes.

Mr. DENT. Then the gentleman from California was entitled to an hour and has used 2 hours and 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. That is true.

Mr. DENT. I was under the impression that the gentleman from California was going to move to go back into the House to see if we could reach an agreement, and I would like to know exactly how we are proceeding.

The CHAIRMAN. We are proceeding in this way: A Member being recognized secures the floor for one hour.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from California whether it is the intention of the gentleman to go on with the debate this afternoon, and that at adjournment it will be regarded by him as closed except that the gentleman from Alabama shall have two hours on Wednesday next?

Mr. KAHN. After we proceed a little while this afternoon, I think we can reach an agreement about the time.

Mr. KITCHIN. Then it is the gentleman's intention to go back into the House and try to reach an agreement?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; before we finally adjourn. I have not had an opportunity to consult with my colleagues on this side of the House.

Mr. KITCHIN. I knew that the gentleman was going to do the fair thing, and I know that that side of the House is going to do the fair thing, but we want to know how the matter stands.

Mr. KAHN. Before long I shall be able to take up the matter with the gentleman from Alabama with the hope of reaching an agreement.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I desire recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for one hour.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, suppose the gentleman from Kentucky occupies only 15 minutes and reserves the remainder of his time, would he have the right to yield that to some one?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky, of course, can yield such portion as he does not occupy.

Mr. KITCHIN. I knew that was the procedure we had last Saturday a week ago on the luxury bill, but that had not prevailed before. I think it is right.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I indorse in part the speech just made by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] and disapprove it in part. I agree with his indorsement of the President as Commander in Chief of the armed forces of the United States, his indorsement of the Secretary of War in the performance of the arduous duties which have devolved upon him in the prosecution of the war, and his indorsement of the efforts of the American Army in France; but I do not agree with his contention that had America had an army of 250,000 men prior to the war she would not have become involved in the war. Mr. Chairman, it was not our lack of a large army that induced or led Germany to violate the sovereignty of the United States and murder our women and children on the seas. It was her deliberate design to wage a war of conquest for world supremacy and her belief that she could accomplish that result that led her to disregard our rights under international law and murder our people in violation of the dictates of humanity.

Germany knew the man-power, the resources, and strength of our country before we entered the war. It is contended, and I believe the contention to be true, that she had acquired, through her spy system, better military maps of our country than we had ourselves. She knew the temperament of the American people; the pep and skill of American men and their daring courage in the execution of their decisions. She knew all that, but notwithstanding her thorough knowledge of it all, her desire for conquest, her dreams of world supremacy, supported by her self-conceit, led her to force a condition of war upon us.

We recall that in 1908 she attempted to plant a colony in South America and reluctantly withdrew when the President of the United States demanded her withdrawal. No doubt she felt then that her withdrawal was only temporary, because her plans were not then ripe for armed controversy with the United States. She realized that her first step by armed force must be toward conquering Europe; and it almost makes me shudder when I realize how near she came to accomplishing that result. France and England were fighting with their backs to the wall, unable to make an offensive move anywhere on the whole battle line when America entered the struggle. But at that the free peoples of the world owe to France and England and their European allies a debt of everlasting gratitude for the courage with which they withstood the German onslaught until assistance could reach them from across the seas.

The German Army was within 31 miles of Paris, the French capital, and was dropping bombs upon it from her master guns in the rear of her front lines when the first American engagement was started. If Paris had fallen, France would have fallen and London would have been the next German objective; and let us remember, gentlemen, that while Germany was reducing Belgium and northern France to ruins in her movement toward Paris, and prior to our entry into the war, she was attempting by negotiation to bring Mexico and Japan into the war as her allies and against the United States, as a result of which Mexico was to be given territory from the southern side of the United States and Japan from the western side and the islands of the Pacific. And these negotiations were being attempted by Count von Bernstorff, the German Ambassador to the United States, at that time living in Washington by the courtesy of this Government and under its protection. While all that was occurring, Germany was secretly organizing in Atlantic waters a fleet of submarines which she believed would be impregnable, which she believed would prevent America from transporting an army across the water. She knew that we would enter the war, for she designed to force us to do so; it was a part of her scheme. She believed that she would conquer and become the master of Europe with and by the strength of her land forces and at the same time defeat the United States on the seas with her submarines.

Then, with Europe conquered and America driven from Atlantic waters by her submarines and involved with Mexico on land and with Japan in the Pacific, she could without interference from the United States renew her efforts to plant her colonies in South America and ultimately monopolize or conquer those countries; and had she defeated France and England, who knows that she would not have occupied Canada and attacked us from Canadian soil, and, as the ally of Mexico, from Mexican soil also? She had prepared in advance for the transportation of troops by water. The great steamer Leviathan, on which our party went to Europe, which is the largest ship afloat, was constructed by Germany for a troop ship. Its captain made the proud boast during a banquet given by him on her first trip across the water that she would carry 10,000 troops. A foreign ambassador, a guest at the banquet, asked him the question, "Carry them across the Atlantic?" and, apparently without realizing the significance of the question so suddenly propounded, the captain answered, "Yes; across the Atlantic." And, Mr. Chairman, the Leviathan is carrying not only 10,000 but upward of 12,000 troops across the Atlantic, but they are American and not German troops. [Applause.] The Emperatta, the sister ship of the Leviathan, which has also been taken over by us, carries an equal number of troops and has practically the same amount of tonnage, and the Mount Vernon, on which our party returned from Europe, and her sister ship, the Agamemnon, both German vessels, each carry upward of 6,000 persons; and these constitute only a few of the ships of the once powerful German fleet, which were designed to carry German troops and German supplies in Germany's war of conquest. Had her submarine campaign been successful, she in all probability would have been operating them across the Atlantic ere this, waging war against us on the Western Hemisphere and probably upon our own soil from Canada on the north or from Mexico on the south, or from both.

Mr. Chairman, we sometimes hear it said by unthinking or uninformed people that our soldiers crossed the water to fight for France or for England. I regret to hear remarks of that character. Our Army went to Europe to fight for America. We attacked there because it was the shortest route to an early victory and because the defeat of Germany there meant to save American women, American children, American homes, and American territory from the outrages suffered by France, Belgium, and Russia at the hands of the German Army. Our losses and our suffering were heavy, but not so heavy as it would have been had Germany got a footing on the shores of our own country.

I talked with a German Army officer in an American prison camp in France. He spoke English fluently, as do about 25 per cent of the German people. I asked him how long before the signing of the armistice did his people realize that they had lost the war. "A quarter of a year," was his reply. "Our people, our rulers," he continued, "realized that they had made a mistake by precipitating trouble with America when they found that they could not prevent America from landing an army in France." "It was their belief, then," I asked, "that our Army would not be able to get by their submarines?" "That is correct," he answered, and continued with the statement: "Had our people known that America would put an army in France, despite the submarines, their course would have been different." His statement adds strength to the contention that Germany calmly and deliberately planned to force America into the war, believing that she would be able to accomplish our defeat on the sea while accomplishing the defeat of her European enemies on land, thereby becoming the master of Europe and the master of the seas, which would have been a long step toward the mastership of the world. But, notwithstanding her submarine nests, our splendid Navy transported men and supplies across the Atlantic on the most colossal scale that the world had ever known, and our forces, as they landed in France, proceeded in the same manner in their preparation for the prosecution of the war. In fact, the work that was done and the rapidity with which it was done is inconceivable. At Brest docks were constructed for landing men and supplies and many miles of railroad track was constructed for handling them after reaching land; at St. Nazaire 140 miles of railroad track were planned, 110 miles of which had been completed when the armistice was signed; and 138 warehouses were constructed, 4 of which are 440 by 500 feet, the remainder are 50 by 500 feet, all of which were filled with supplies as fast as they were completed.

At Bordeaux 40 master cranes, operated by electricity, were constructed for unloading ships. The system is so complete that they can unload an average cargo in one hour. At that point 210 miles of railroad track were planned for handling the men and supplies after reaching land, 139 of which had been completed when the armistice was signed. Adequate camps and warehouses were also constructed to take care of the men and supplies arriving at that port.

When the American engineers presented their plans for the docks at Bordeaux the French authorities said it would require eight years to complete their construction, but American engineers, with American mechanics, American labor, and American skill, completed their construction in eight weeks.

Marseille is also a great harbor where much improvement was made by our forces to prepare for handling our shipping at that point. Gieves, which is an inland point, was constructed by our forces from the ground up as a supply depot and was our main source of supplies for the front. It contains about 150 miles of railroad track, a monster cold-storage plant and warehouses 50 by 500 feet, sufficient to cover a distance of six miles if built in a continuous line end to end. Then, there are other small supply depots and numerous salvage (repair) depots, together with the records division and all other divisions and auxiliaries necessary to the care, protection, and successful operation of the Army.

It is only fair to say that in some instances the labor forces were not provided with proper quarters while constructing some, and perhaps many, of these plants. The officers claimed that the demand and necessity for supplies at the front forced them to press the construction of warehouses and railroad trackage to the exclusion of living quarters for the construction forces. In addition to the ports and supply depots that I have mentioned, and many others too numerous to mention, our forces constructed or repaired hundreds of miles of railroad and turnpike for the transportation of troops and supplies from the various ports and supply depots to the front.

As an economic proposition the effort in France was one of gross extravagance, but as a military proposition every dollar expended represented a good investment, because of the depressing effect that our colossal efforts had upon Germany.

When our work was well under way Gen. Pershing had a military observer from one of the neutral countries of Europe carried around by American Army officers and shown the whole effort with its entire plan. The information obtained by the observer was given, either by direction or indirection, to German officials and German papers, and realizing, as that information forced them to do, that despite their submarines we had entered Europe and were preparing to wage war on the most gigantic scale that military science had ever planned, their courage began to fail them, their enthusiasm began to wane, and their army began to fail, all of which hurried the end, saved American lives and American blood. I therefore indorse that or any other investment of money which saves human life.

Of course mistakes were made in the organization of the Army and the expenditure of the funds. There never was an Army of such size gotten together so quickly, and in an Army of such proportions it would be impossible not to get some incompetency and some dishonesty; and while the incompetents and crooks were weeded out as fast as they were discovered the rush was too great to permit their discovery in time to entirely prevent mistakes and mischief. There were miscarriages of justice in courts-martial trials which should be corrected and corrected speedily as far as correction is possible.

As a whole, no army was ever so well supplied with food, clothing, and medical supplies. There were some inexcusable cases of neglect, miscarriage of supplies, or misunderstanding which resulted in great hardships to the men. There were also instances where Army officers were cruel and inhumane to their men, because their positions afforded them the privilege, not the right, to do so; and if I had my way I would force every devil who, under his authority as an Army officer, mistreated his men to serve as a private for the remainder of his natural life.

I realize the necessity of Army discipline. The success of the Army demands it and the well-being of the men themselves demand it; but there is a clear distinction between discipline administered by a conscientious Army officer who loves his men, who realizes that they have rights and who recognizes those rights, and unwarranted insults and cruelty inflicted by the narrow-minded arrogant cur in the uniform of an officer who believes and contends that privates have no rights. God created all men with certain inalienable rights which even the military has no right to invade or disregard, and the sooner all Army officers learn that fact and recognize those rights the better it will be for the Army. For several reasons the Army would profit by a uniform recognition of that fact, chief of which is the fact that while the officer, if he is a Regular officer, continues in the military service, and may contribute much to the military policy of the country, he is, by the very nature of his position, prevented from participation in the civil affairs of the Government; while on the other hand the private, who may be, and who in many instances is, the intellectual and moral superior of his officer, returns to civil life and becomes a factor in the civil affairs of the Government, which, under our Constitution and practice, dominate and regulate the Military Establishment. The private or noncommissioned officer who has received at the hands of his superiors the treatment and consideration to which he was entitled, returns to civil life with a kindly feeling for the military authorities and a mind unprejudiced against them, but he who feels and especially he who knows that he has not received it, returns to his civil pursuit with a heart full of bitterness and resentment which may in years to come impel him to mold sentiment against the Military Establishment to its serious detriment.

I have discussed the subject with many Army officers; some of them, in fact most of them, are in accord with my views; some are not. I desire to say in passing that the most liberal-minded man with whom I have discussed the subject is Gen. Smedley Butler, of the United States Marines, who was connected with the Army at Brest when I was in Europe and who, by the way, is a son of our worthy colleague from Pennsylvania.

In discussing the subject Gen. Butler said: "We came to Europe with a single object in view, the defeat of Germany. We have accomplished that object, and with that accomplished we have another single object in view, to wit, the return of these boys to their parents and their civil pursuits; and it is the duty of every officer to exert the best that there is in him to have them carry back with them the most kindly feeling for every officer under whom they have served or with whom they have come in contact; first, because we owe it to them for the service that they have rendered; second, because the success of the Government and our success as officers all depended and still depend upon the fidelity and service of the men; and, third, because we owe it to the Government and its Military and Naval Establishments of the future to have these men return to civil life with a feeling of mutual interest in those establishments."

Next to Gen. Butler, in liberal views on the question of the treatment of the enlisted personnel, was Maj. Gen. Chas. P. Summerall, who commanded the First Division at the beginning of the Meuse-Argonne offensive, and who was immediately promoted to the position of corps commander, and, I will add, who is one of the most, if not the most conspicuous figure of the American Expeditionary Forces, because of his character as a man, his courage and ability, and his success on the battle field. Gen. Summerall has the reputation of being one of the world's hardest fighters in battle; and I am told by officers who were associated with him in action that one of the thoughts at all times uppermost in his mind was the welfare of his men, and that during operations he would spend his nights canvassing the trenches to see if the men were being supplied with food, water, and other necessities. During several days' association with him I heard him refer repeatedly to his men and express his love for them as though they were his own children, and with tears in his eyes which apparently sprang from the depth of his strong and courageous heart I have seen him, on the scene of action, relate how his men had fallen there, and at other times in his reference to the returning soldiers his greatest concern was apparently for their future welfare.

Then, on the other hand, I saw and talked with some officers who apparently had no more regard for the men under them than they would have had for that many dumb brutes, and some of them not so much.

I am glad that I can say that in my opinion only a small per cent of the officers are of the class last referred to, but that class, though small, is not only a detriment to the Military Establishment, but is also a curse to the Government; for the bitterness engendered in the enlisted personnel by the conduct of that class is fraught with the danger of germinating the seeds of anarchy and Bolshevism, against which we guard.

Mr. Chairman, as I have previously stated, some mistakes have been made and shortcomings have asserted themselves in the prosecution of the war which are proper subjects of criticism, but let us not magnify them. Let us not criticize where criticism is unwarranted, but let us carefully weigh the good along with the bad; let us weigh the achievements of the Army along with its failures here and there, and when we do this we will, I am sure, reach the conclusion that no army has ever met its task with greater rapidity or success than has our Army, and that no military force ever acquitted itself more beautifully than did the American Expeditionary Force, which has crushed autocracy in Europe. [Applause.] And let me say in this connection that every branch of the service was a potent factor and contributed its full part to the winning of the war. The men of the Navy also contributed their full share. It required men in the Navy to transport troops and supplies across the seas; it required labor to handle the supplies. The fighting forces of an army can not fight, can not exist, without supplies. It required office and clerical force to keep the records as required by law, and without which the Army would become disorganized, revolutionized, and ineffective. As the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] has so well said, every branch of the service was essential to the success so gloriously achieved by the American Army, for which the American people owe it a debt of everlasting gratitude. [Applause.] Our first and greatest gratitude is, of course, to the men who engaged in battle, for their burdens, their efforts, their sufferings, and their sacrifices were the greatest. In fact, so great were they that none except those who endured them can realize the burdens and sufferings they imposed. I therefore wonder if the American people fully appreciate the services of these brave and noble men and fully estimate the burdens they have borne and the sacrifices they have made. Why, the scenes of action as we find them now, several months after the cessation of hostilities, are indescribable. We spent nearly 30 days on European soil, traveling in automobiles by day and by rail at night from one scene of action to another. We traveled 4,636 miles in France, Belgium, Italy, and Germany, and Mr. DENT and I visited London and intermediate points in England. Yet we did not see all the fields of activity and could not visualize what we did see because of the extent and character of the destruction. We spent nine days in the battle fields of eastern and northern France, during which we covered the fields of Belleau Wood, Chateau-Thierry, St. Mihiel, Verdun, the Meuse-Argonne, Soissons, Champaign Valley, Vimy Ridge, Mount Kemmel, and Flanders, where millions of soldiers fell and where billions of dollars were expended in war materials and supplies, and where the destruction can not be described by human pen or human tongue.

In an area of 4,000 square miles in France and Belgium there is hardly a habitable house left. Cities ranging in size from 200,000 population down to small villages averaging one to every one and one-half square miles were totally destroyed by artillery. Many of them were blown and broken into heaps of broken stone and sand. No regard was had by the enemy for churches, schools, hospitals, asylums, orphanages, or charitable institutions. They were all accorded the same treatment, reduced to the same wanton destruction. The few houses within the battle area that were not destroyed by shell shot were deliberately burned by the Germans as they withdrew in their retreat. Hundreds of acres of forest were killed. The land of practically the entire area is destroyed by trenches, dugouts, and fox holes dug by the soldiers for their protection and shell holes caused by artillery fire, the land being damaged to such an extent that it will cost millions of dollars to reclaim it for agriculture or industrial purposes. Not a hoof of live stock is to be seen in all the devastated area. In addition to the cost in labor, the reclamation service will be extremely dangerous, because of the unexploded shells which failed to explode when fired from the heavy guns and lie buried in the earth. Their failure to explode was due to a lack of certain elements which they contract from the earth by contact with it. Therefore the longer they lie buried in the ground the more dangerous they become; so much so that the slightest jar is likely to explode them, which means death to anyone near. In fact, the whole devastated area of 400 miles in length and averaging 10 miles in width is worse than a barren waste. It is full of destructive elements both in the unexploded shells and disease which the poisoned condition of the soil and water must naturally produce. A country on which rivers of blood have flown and in which thousands of bodies of men and animals are buried can not be other than a hotbed of disease for years to come. The bodies were buried where they fell or in small groups near where they fell, but the Graves Registration Service is now collecting them and reinterring them in central cemeteries. Four central cemeteries have been made for the American dead, one at Suresnes, just out of Paris, where 3,000 of our precious dead are laid to rest; one at Romagne, in the northern part of the Meuse-Argonne, where 26,000 lie; one at Thiancourt, where those who fell in the St. Mihiel battle are to be laid; and another in the vicinity of Chateau-Thierry and Belleau Wood, where the brave boys who fell in those engagements are to sleep until the judgment or until disinterred and returned to their native land for which they fought and died on foreign soil.

At the head of each grave is a small wooden cross about 24 inches high on which hangs the identification tag of the soldier whose grave it marks; also an aluminum plate about 2 by 4 inches, on which is embossed the name and organization of the soldier, is nailed on the cross. Mr. Chairman, as I stood by those graves my thoughts went out to and my heart ached for the parents, and especially the mothers, of the heroes whose remains they contained. I wish it were possible for a generous Government to compensate them for the contribution they have made to civilization and liberty, but it is not. I wish it were possible for sympathetic friends to comfort them in their sorrow, but it is not. God alone is able to compensate their loss and comfort them in their bereavement; and I pray that He may bless and comfort them.

Now, some inquiries have been made during the discussion as to how soon we expect to get our troops out of Europe. There has been a great deal of speculation as to how soon that will be accomplished and a great deal of criticism because the troops have not been returned more rapidly; but, my friends, the War Department is doing everything within its power to bring the men back from Europe as speedily as possible. Every available inch of ship space is being utilized to its maximum capacity in transporting them. I was told by the directors of transportation at Brest and Bordeaux that they leave no bunk unfilled on any ship sailing to the United States; that when an organization that is to board a ship fails to fill it men are called from other organizations to finish filling it; that if there is only room for a dozen or half dozen more men there is a supply always held on which to draw to fill up that empty space.

So the Government is leaving no stone unturned to bring back the American boys as rapidly as it is possible to bring them. Of course, when the armistice was signed people became impatient. Fathers and mothers all over the land began to ask themselves the question, "Why do they not send my boy home? The war is over; they do not need him over there any longer, and why do they keep him?" I received letters containing inquiries of that kind. Doubtless every Member of Congress received them. And we sometimes grew impatient because we believed, or felt, that men were being kept in Europe who were not needed there. But we failed to stop and realize that it was impossible to return within a few weeks or a few months the men that we had transported, covering a period of 18 months, with the best facilities available and the best efforts we could put forth. But since the people have begun to understand that the Government is returning the men as rapidly as it is possible to return them they are accepting the situation and reconciling themselves to it. Of course, we want the men back as rapidly as they can be brought back, and that is what is being done. They are coming back now at the rate of more than 300,000 men a month, with the rate increasing each month, and at that rate all the men will be back by late summer or early fall.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. FIELDS. I will.

Mr. HARRISON. Do you recall the declaration of President Wilson to the committee as to what the policy of the Government would be in that regard?

Mr. FIELDS. I do. The President said it was his policy, as I recall—and if I do not state it correctly I stand to be corrected—to get the men out of Europe just as rapidly as it was possible to get them out, and it was his intention to have them out by late summer or early fall. He stated that the Allies were anxious to keep the American flag on the Rhine for a time, and were urging him to leave a handful of soldiers there to maintain the flag, but he had not even assured them or promised them that he would do that. I inferred from the statement of the President that he was, like every other American citizen that I have talked with or heard of, anxious to get the American Army out of Europe at the earliest date possible.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FIELDS. I will.

Mr. FESS. My question is as to our ability to get the men out, what our tonnage is, and so on. I hold in my hand a letter from Mr. Hurley on the shipping situation, but I find that he does not in any place say what number of vessels we have completed. He says, "With this sum we have built and expect to build 2,434 vessels, aggregating thirteen million plus dead-weight tons," and so on. But I find no place where we have the figures as to the number of vessels that can be used now for this purpose. Has the gentleman those figures?

Mr. FIELDS. I have not the number of vessels, but I will say that in April we transported 289,000 troops; in May, 330,000. At that rate the gentleman will see that within a few months we will have our troops back.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman permit me to reply there?

Mr. FIELDS. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Gen. March stated that they had a gross tonnage which would bring 363,000 men a month; but that you can not expect that many, because they can not use the full space for troops.

Mr. FESS. In taking troops over we never took over more than 300,000 a month, did we?

Mr. FIELDS. I think not.

Mr. FESS. And we called upon Great Britain to assist us to a very large extent?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes; we had the help of Great Britain in transporting our troops to Europe; but she withdrew her ships to send her own troops home to Australia, Canada, and India after the armistice was signed.

Mr. FESS. Is that continuing now, or have we the help of Great Britain now?

Mr. FIELDS. We were told that we would get help from Great Britain as soon as she should complete the task of transporting her own troops.

Mr. FESS. In other words, in your judgment the transportation is going on as rapidly as the facilities will permit?

Mr. FIELDS. Absolutely so.

Mr. FESS. I am glad to know that.

Mr. FIELDS. As I said a moment ago, every available ship is being used and is being rushed back and forth across the Atlantic at its maximum speed. Why, they are loading ships in from two to nine hours. The biggest ship afloat, the Leviathan, was in Brest Harbor only nine hours; the Mount Vernon, one of the next largest, was in the harbor but a little over five hours; and some of them are loaded in two hours. I believe they told me of one small ship that was loaded in an hour.

The system is this: Of course, they know by wireless at what time a ship will arrive. Everything is in readiness. The men are at the dock with their packs, ready to go on board, and when the ship anchors out in the bay, as the large ships must do at Brest, there is a portion of the men on the tugs ready to go on board, and other tugs follow in rapid succession until the ship is loaded. Each man goes in and takes a bunk and remains in it until the entire ship is loaded. So there is no obstruction. No one gets in the other fellow's way. By that system they are loaded with the greatest possible speed. And the moment the loading is done the ship weighs anchor and sails for America. There is not, I will say, one moment of time wasted. In fact, I have never seen anything carried on so systematically and so rapidly as the movement of our troops from Europe. When we were there the men were going on board at the rate of seven per minute for each minute of every day, and, as previously stated, the rate is continually increasing. The system and the achievement by reason of it will stand as a monument to the American Navy as long as there is an American Navy.

Mr. FESS. Has the gentleman estimated what time it will take to remove all of the troops that will not be required to remain over there?

Mr. FIELDS. Well, as I said a moment ago, at the present rate—which, of course, they are increasing right along—we should get them back by late summer or early autumn.

Mr. FESS. Then the cut in the appropriation seems to be justified.

Mr. FIELDS. I think so.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. But is it not stated that they expected to bring over 300,000 in the month of June and as many more in July, which would return all of the troops except the five Regular divisions which are retained in the Army of occupation, and at the present time all of the National Army and all National Guard organizations or divisions are either at home or on the sea, and that four or six divisions, as I understand it, are now being brought across, and by the 1st of August they expect to have all back except the Army of occupation and a few men they expect to keep in the Service of Supply Division, which are to remain after the other troops depart, in order to clean up? One of the reasons why they are able to do this is on account of the fact that many of the ships which were necessary to be used as cargo ships while we had our men over there in full strength have been transformed into troop ships for the carrying of passengers, which required some little time for making the change, but at the present time, while they have aimed at the maximum of 310,000, in May they brought over something like 330,000.

Mr. FIELDS. The gentleman's observations are in harmony with my contentions. If I grasp his statement, it is that all troops will be transported by July, with the exception of a few men in the Service of Supply and the Army of occupation, and it will require from six to eight weeks to transport those, which will carry us into late summer or early autumn. In any event, everything is being done that is humanly possible to expedite the movement of our troops from Europe.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman inform the House how many troops we have in the United States that are not now in the course of being discharged, that are not having their final accounts made up for their immediate discharge?

Mr. FIELDS. I have not the exact figures at hand. I did not know until 10.30 this morning that this bill would be called up to-day. I had intended to collect certain data on it to-day, which would include the figures that the gentleman refers to, but I did not have time to collect any data between that hour and the time that the House convened. I am, therefore, unable to give the gentleman the exact number in camp in this country at this time who are not in the course of being discharged.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. When I was last informed on the subject we had about 400,000 men in the United States who were not in the course of being discharged, most of them being in Quartermaster and Medical Services, some few others being retained as skeleton organizations of units that were contemplated to be retained. I am wondering how long we are going to keep those men in the service. There is a very great demand on the part of the people to get their sons out who are hanging around the camps, guarding stores, and doing things of that sort. I notice that this bill makes no provision to enforce their discharge.

Mr. FIELDS. I will remind the gentleman that this is an appropriation and not a legislative bill.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. There is no limitation on the use of the appropriations for that purpose?

Mr. FIELDS. No; the gentleman is no more anxious than I am to have the men demobilized as rapidly as it is possible to demobilize them; and the gentleman will probably recall that I stated when the last Army appropriation bill was under discussion in this House that while it was necessary to keep men to maintain a few demobilization camps, I was of the opinion that demobilization had not been expedited in this country as much as it should have been. I think that every man should be turned loose in this country, every man that the Government can spare, as quickly as it is possible to turn him loose.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman permit me to call his attention to the fact that men conscripted for service during the war are being retained to perform ordinary mechanical duties in repair shops, and things of that kind, and to take charge of clerical work and other things that can be better done by civilians, and yet they are taking advantage of these men to hold them there because they happen to have them there?

Mr. FIELDS. Of course, certain clerical work and other work must be done at demobilization camps in handling the returning soldiers, and men must be kept to do it; but I repeat what I have previously said on this floor, that the men in this country should be demobilized down to the minimum as rapidly as possible. In fact, that should have been done a good while ago.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Does not the gentleman think we ought to adopt some proviso in this bill not permitting the use of the money we are appropriating in keeping these unwilling men in the service performing duties that would be better done by civilians?

Mr. FIELDS. No. We would probably cut off the pay of a large number of the men by attempting to prevent the Army from paying a few of them. If I should offer a proviso, it would be a proviso forcing the Army to turn them out.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. That is what I had in contemplation, some provision that would make it necessary for these men to be turned loose and to come home and have their places filled by civilians hired by the Government at perhaps no greater expense than it is now incurring.

Mr. FIELDS. I have no quarrel with the gentleman as to that. I agree with him that the men should be discharged as rapidly as it is possible to discharge them.

Mr. FOSTER. I might add that we have a proposition out in Ohio, at Camp Sherman, 60 miles from my home, right now where men are doing work of that kind when they are badly needed on the farms.

Mr. FIELDS. I trust that gentlemen will not take too much of my time.

Mr. WELTY. The gentleman spoke about using all available shipping for the purpose of transporting our troops, in addition to our own shipping. Will the gentleman inform the House what other shipping we are using now?

Mr. FIELDS. I did not deem it necessary to ask for a detailed statement as to the countries the shipping was coming from. We were told by a naval officer and by the Secretary of War that they were getting all the shipping that it was possible for them to get, and were using all of it to its maximum capacity.

Mr. WELTY. Are we using the ships of Denmark and other countries?

Mr. FIELDS. I think my statement that I did not ask for detailed information is a sufficient answer.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I know that the Government is engaging space on commercial boats of other countries, just as much as it can get. I came home on a Holland boat chartered by the Government, and they are chartering all the boats they can get from other countries.

Mr. WELTY. Did they have troops on board the boat on which the gentleman came home?

Mr. ASHBROOK. They did.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to refer to one other thought in regard to the work of American soldiers on the battle fields of Europe. Without going to Europe and going over the fields where the battles were fought no one can realize fully what the men who participated in those battles endured and what they accomplished. As I have previously stated, we saw shell hole after shell hole, mountains almost blown down, trench by the side of trench, and acres after acres of barbed wire, much of the ordinary fencing wire that we see used by the farmers of this country, but much of it a heavy wire, a single strand almost as large as one's little finger with a barb three-quarters of an inch long. I have a piece of it in my office among my souvenirs. Had I known before I left my office that this bill was coming up to-day I would have brought it over.

One of the striking features of the whole effort was the courage that the American soldier showed in meeting the barbed-wire difficulties. In my limited time I can not refer to many of their daring adventures, all of which make our hearts swell with pride and gratitude, but I do want to refer to this one. Some of the generals told us that one of the great problems when they started the American offensive was the barbed-wire menace.

The Germans had occupied this territory for four years, had established the Hindenburg line until it was, as they thought, impregnable, and our forces were confronted with miles and miles of trenches, well fortified, behind which and between which were nets and entanglements of barbed wire. They decided that they would attempt to invent a machine to cut the wire, and that such a machine, if invented, would be one of the most valuable machines in use in the war, because of the extent of the barbed-wire menace and its effectiveness in delaying troop movements; but when the first engagement came the American soldiers went over the top of the barbed wire as though it was not there. They apparently paid no attention to it. I remember that one officer stated that he made inquiries of the officers and men after one fight was over as to how they got over the wire. They were over, their leggings and trousers were torn into shreds, but only two of them remembered anything about going over it. They had their hearts in the fight and they had rushed forward with that "pep" and vigor that carried them through every undertaking and made it possible for them to win the war in so brief a period as they did. The "pep" and individuality of the American soldier did more to win this war speedily than anything else upon which the American Army had to rely or did rely.

And one thing I particularly noticed in talking to the men. I asked them if in the engagements they observed the manual of arms; if in actual combat they observed the teachings laid down in the manual of arms, and each one answered no, that he had fought upon his own initiative; that he depended upon his own judgment; that he relied upon his own skill; that he depended upon his own ability to outdo the other fellow. Therefore it was the American skill, American spirit, American ability, and not military training that made our men fight as they did, which is a credit to the manhood of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, summing up the whole situation, it is putting it mildly to say that the battle area presents "destruction, destruction, destruction until destruction sickens," and how any man in whose bosom beats a human heart can look upon, read of, or hear of the desolation it has left, the distress, the sorrow, the pain, the misery, and death that it has caused, saying nothing of the financial burdens it has imposed, and oppose a legitimate effort to prevent a recurrence of it, is beyond my understanding. When we entered the war it was the hope of everybody that out of the war would come a settlement that would prevent future wars, a settlement that would guarantee the future peace of the world, and men went to battle believing that their sacrifices would each be a contribution to that glorious achievement. But now that the war is over, and peace terms are being negotiated, we see organized effort to defeat that part of the peace treaty—namely, the league of nations—that undertakes to prevent future wars. They say, leave conditions and international relations as they are. Yet under those conditions and relations we have just been involved in the bloodiest war of all time. The opponents of the league of nations assert that the league, if adopted, will involve us in foreign disputes and difficulties. But their assertion is without a fact to support it or a reason upon which to rest. We have just been involved in a foreign difficulty, and can have no assurance that we will not become involved in future difficulties if present conditions are perpetuated. International difficulties may continue to arise; in fact, they will continue to arise. Difficulties will continue to arise between nations just as they will continue to arise between individuals; and what civilization and humanity want and demand is that nations shall be compelled, like individuals have long since been compelled, to submit their difficulties to a court of justice for trial and settlement.

The time was when there were no courts to restrain the action or adjudicate the difficulties between individuals. The time was when each individual was a law unto himself without any limitation upon his own sovereignty except such limitations as his fellow man was able to impose by physical force. Therefore, the settlement of each difficulty between individuals meant war between those individuals until reason asserted itself in the minds of men, causing them to adopt rules under which to live and by which to settle their difficulties. Those rules were called law. The law was first established by local communities.

As local communities grew and their moral, social, economic, and financial interests expanded, they recognized the necessity for an expansion of the law, or of forming a group of local communities into a larger community under a uniform system of laws; then from the larger community to the county or township, and from the county or township to the state or province, and from the state or province to the nation, and I venture the assertion that no law was ever written that did not place a limitation upon the sovereignty of some individual, community, county, or state in some form or other, the limitation being imposed not for the detriment of him or them upon whom imposed but for the welfare of society and the protection of all alike in their legitimate and peaceful pursuits.

The opponents of the league of nations also urge as an objection to it that it, if adopted, will limit the sovereignty of the United States. Limitation upon sovereignty is in the main self-restraint adopted by individuals collectively under normal conditions for their own guidance and protection under abnormal conditions. If each individual were capable of exercising proper self-restraint under all conditions, and at all times inclined to do so, the adoption and enforcement of laws would be unnecessary. But man possesses neither the ability nor inclination to do so, hence the necessity of laws and their enforcement. Nations are not different from the individual units which compose them—no stronger, no weaker, no better, no worse. That which is good for the individual units of a nation is also good for the nation itself, and that which is bad for the individual units is likewise bad for the nation itself. If the individual units profit and are made secure in their rights by submitting their difficulties to the courts for adjudication instead of settling them by physical force, the nation must likewise enjoy the same profit and security by submitting its difficulties with other nations to the courts for adjudication.

Oh, some say that it would affect the honor of the Nation for it to limit its sovereignty by submitting its difficulties with other nations to a tribunal created for the purpose of adjudicating such difficulties. The same arguments were made as to individuals when dueling was permitted under the law. While dueling was permitted by individuals, the individual who declined to accept a challenge to fight a duel disgraced himself by his declination, and was ostracized by society, but when society revolted at the cruelty of dueling and enacted a law prohibiting it, it immediately became as dishonorable in the eyes of all men to give a challenge to fight a duel as it had been prior to the enactment of the law to decline a challenge; and men who had previously advocated dueling and who had believed that they could not protect their honor under certain conditions without resorting to the cruel and inhumane process found that they could maintain their honor by submitting their controversies with individuals to courts of justice.

And I venture the prophecy here that the time will come when the society of nations the world over will hold in contempt and ostracize the nation that is unwilling to submit its difficulties with other nations to a court of justice, and when that day shall come men will read the history of past wars and marvel that civilized nations ever went to war for the settlement of difficulties, just as we marvel at the fact that dueling was once legalized by law and received public sanction. The same process of evolution that has developed the character and broadened the reason of men sufficiently to impel them to establish civil tribunals for the adjustment of their difficulties must inevitably impel the nations to pursue a like course and establish like tribunals.

The opponents of the league of nations say that the league will have no power to enforce its recommendations. It is true that the league within itself would have no such power; neither has a civil court the power within itself to execute its own decisions. But public sentiment crystallized into law, which created and maintains the courts, carries into execution their judgments, and when the public sentiment of the world creates a league of nations, a council of nations, a union of nations, or a confederation of nations, or whatever you choose to call it, out of which will come a civil tribunal for the orderly settlement of difficulties between nations, the same public sentiment will sustain the court, affirm and execute its judgments.

The opponents of the league ask by what process can the mandates of an international court be carried into execution. I would say that there may be many methods by which that result could be accomplished, but to my mind the power of boycott, as was suggested by Theodore Roosevelt several years ago and for which the draft of the league of nations provides, will be the most effective method. Under that plan nations becoming involved in difficulties which threaten the peace of the world will be obligated by the league to submit their case to the international court for adjudication, and if they, or either of them, refuse to submit the case for trial, or having submitted it fail to accept the judgment of the court, the court will then recommend that the signatories of the league set up a boycott against the nation refusing to accept the verdict, or which, in open disregard of the verdict, should proceed to make war. And public sentiment based upon the universal desire of a large majority of the peoples of the world to maintain peace, would execute the order for a boycott. What would that mean to the nation against which directed? It would mean that all member nations of the league would sever diplomatic, social, commercial, and financial relations with it. Cable communications between it and other nations would be discontinued.

The ships of other nations would not be permitted to go into its ports or railroad trains to cross its boundary lines. Nor would its ships be permitted to land in other ports or its railroad trains permitted to cross its boundary line into other countries. In other words, the power of boycott exercised against any nation would mean its isolation from the rest of the world, a condition under which no nation could prosecute a war or long endure. In this day of international relations and international trade through which every nation draws a portion of its supplies from other nations and sells its surplus products to them, a boycott would throw any nation into a panic in 48 hours; and greater than the sting of a panic would be the sting of its consciousness of the fact that it was held in disrepute by the rest of the world. I venture the assertion, and do it without fear of successful contradiction, that any nation would endure longer under fire than it would under boycott. The time was when many nations of the world were so far removed from other parts of the world that the difficulties of the one did not affect the other, but that condition has passed. Modern means of communication and transportation have eliminated distances and have brought the nations of the entire world so close together that the relations of each is interwoven with the others to such an extent that the peace can hardly be disturbed in any part of the world without affecting the whole world. It was the belief of our pioneer fathers when establishing this Government that it was so far removed from Europe that it would never be affected by European wars or European difficulties; but recent events have proven that we may become involved in European troubles regardless of our good intentions and our efforts to escape them. God knows that the President and the American people tried to keep out of the European war, but were unable to do so.

It was the belief of many eminent scholars and statesmen in the early days of our Government that our geographic position, with 3,000 miles of water to east of us and over 10,000 miles to the west of us, rendered us secure from European or Asiatic complications and immune from attack from either source. Those views were entertained by some until recently. I have heard the opinion expressed on this floor during my brief service here and within the last four years that it would be an impossibility to transport a formidable army across the Atlantic; but gentlemen who expressed those views have lived to see 2,000,000 troops with much of their supplies transported across the Atlantic with greater facility than they could have been transported across one of our average-sized States during our Civil War. In 1807 a New York paper announced with a great deal of pride that it was only three months behind London in the publication of London news; to-day the American papers report the news of London as early as the London papers report it; to-day we read of the happenings on the other side of the earth as quickly as we read of the happenings in our own country.

In former days when one part of the world became involved in war, the rest of the world knew but little about it and for that reason felt but little concern because of it. But with present international relations and present means of transportation and communication, war in any section of the world is seen and understood by the rest of the world and its effects are felt by all; and, Mr. Chairman, it is that condition that is causing the best brains of the entire world to attempt to devise means by which to prevent future wars.

The league of nations as drafted may not be, in fact, is not, perfect, but it is a start in the right direction, and can be improved as time and events demonstrate the necessity for its improvement. The organic law of our own country was not made perfect and is not now perfect. Eighteen amendments to our Constitution have been adopted since the original Constitution was written. Other amendments making further necessary improvements will doubtless be adopted in the future; and I will say in passing that that instrument in which every American finds security and protection in his legitimate pursuits was not adopted without criticism and without a struggle. The opponents of the league of nations say that the league would not be an absolute guaranty against war among nations. I will answer that argument by saying that the Constitution of the United States was not from the start an absolute guaranty against war between the States. One war was required to demonstrate the efficacy of the Constitution, but one was enough to demonstrate its strength and assure its perpetuity; and to-day every man under its flag from east to west, from north to south, except an anarchist here and there, glories in its maintenance and the preservation of the Union under it.

The league of nations may fail as did our Federal Constitution to serve as an absolute guaranty against war from the date of its adoption. Under it as under the Constitution one war may be necessary to demonstrate its strength and guarantee obedience to its provisions. The opponents of the league contend for the absolute and unlimited sovereignty of the United States. I ask them what will be the result when the absolute, unlimited sovereignty of the United States according to their term and definition conflicts with the absolute, unlimited sovereignty of another great power. The result will be an orderly settlement by an international tribunal, as proposed in the league covenant, or a settlement by war in which thousands and probably millions of American lives will be sacrificed.

The principle of unlimited sovereignty, coupled with the refusal to submit controversies growing out of either the exercise or infringement of that sovereignty to properly constituted tribunals for orderly settlement, would if practiced by individuals constitute anarchy and outlawry. The individual attempting to maintain and exercise such a principle must ultimately submit to the force of other individuals or destroy himself by his own evil force. The same is true of nations.

Germany advocated the principle of unlimited sovereignty and made herself the world's greatest military power to enable her to exercise it. She refused to participate in conventions to promote the peace of the world; she refused to submit controverted questions to disinterested parties for settlement; she disregarded every right which conflicted with her unlimited sovereignty. But with all her effort and all her power she failed and is to-day on her knees before the world. Rome attempted to exercise unlimited sovereignty and she fell. Persia also attempted it in the days of Xerxes, before Christ, and Persia fell. Shall we follow the unprofitable and destructive example of Germany, Rome, and Persia, or shall we heed the voice of reason and join in this great effort that is under way to guard and maintain the peace of the world?

Some oppose the league of nations because of their reactionary tendencies which impel them to oppose everything progressive. There are others who oppose it because its main purpose is to prevent war and war makes millionaires overnight; and then there are others still who oppose the movement for the reason that it is being led by Woodrow Wilson, whose politics is different from theirs. I will say to that class that while President Wilson is the recognized leader in the movement by virtue of his position he is not the only great man who has advocated the principle of a league of nations for the orderly settlement of international difficulties. The principle is advocated by ex-President Taft. It was also advocated by former President Roosevelt. It is advocated by former Justice Charles E. Hughes, Republican nominee for the Presidency in 1916. It is now and has long since been advocated by scholars and statesmen of the entire world.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. FIELDS. I ask unanimous consent to continue for one additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FIELDS. The rank and file of all countries who bear the chief burdens of war are demanding its establishment. The fathers and mothers of the belligerent nations who suffered the loss of their sons in the recent war are demanding it. Those who are to produce the sons of the future are demanding it. The voice of humanity the world over is demanding the establishment of such a covenant, and it will be established now or in the early future. [Applause.]

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LaGuardia].

The CHAIRMAN. Let the Chair understand. Does the gentleman from Illinois take the floor for one hour in his own right?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes; in order that I may be able to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. And he yields 30 minutes of that time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA]?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I shall not discuss the league of nations nor the peace treaty, but will use my time in discussion of the bill before the committee. The committee, I believe, unanimously agreed that the Army should return home at the earliest possible moment. The committee also agreed to a man, I believe, that the size of the Army should be reduced, and to accomplish this the amount necessary to get the boys home, to transport them and demobilize them, has been appropriated. Up to that point I agree entirely with the committee. I do not agree with the committee, however, that it is necessary to appropriate for an average Army of 400,000 men, and my reason for that is that I did not understand from the testimony of the Chief of Staff that the Army would be demobilized as soon as it returned from Europe. All of the estimates submitted by the various departments were scrutinized and approved by the General Staff, and the General Staff in its contemplation of the needed appropriations made all its calculations on an Army of 509,000 men plus 28,000 officers. Gen. March did not say that these men would be demobilized as soon as they returned home. I gathered from what he said that he had the 509,000 men Army pretty well fixed in his mind. We have now in this country nearly 500,000 soldiers and 400,000 could be demobilized at once. My reason for cutting down the appropriation in this bill is not to give the General Staff an opportunity, after they get the men home, to keep them up to the last hour of the last day of the four-month period after peace is proclaimed.

We have talked and talked and talked about getting these men home. Now let us legislate a bit and get them home. This is our first opportunity and let us do it.

Gen. March is a very efficient Chief of Staff, they tell me. I was not impressed with his testimony. He has no consideration for the desires of Congress. He has all of the despotic will and autocratic characteristics of Ludendorf and the military genius of the Crown Prince.

He stated, I am informed, after testifying before the Committee on Military Affairs, during the last Congress, that he would have an Army of 509,000 men and 29,000 officers, no matter what Congress did. We were unable to pin him down to just how many men would be continued in the establishment of the Army if we gave him the full amount he asked, and for that reason when we reach page 12, line 4, "pay of officers," I shall move to amend by striking out the figures "$28,605,000" and inserting in lieu thereof the figures "$20,300,000." That would reduce it to a basis of an average Army of 300,000 men. When we reach line 19 of the same page, "pay of enlisted men," I shall move to strike out the figures "$106,795,000" and to insert in lieu thereof the figures "$75,728,230." With the men now in the service, the department would be compelled to speed up the present rate of demobilization, in order to have funds to carry it on to the end of the fiscal year. That will give notice to the War Department that Congress, the legislative branch of this Government, expects it to demobilize the troops the minute they return, and to bring the Army down to the figures provided for in the national-defense act. Then if they keep the men under arms too long, and have a deficiency, the burden will be upon the department or General Staff to prove the necessity for the deficiency and the reason for delaying the demobilization of the Army. The General Staff is making every effort to keep the appropriation high. I want to keep it down. Not a soldier will suffer or lose a cent of pay. There is no force in that argument. If the department or General Staff keeps more men than it should, they will be held responsible. If we give them the money—allowing a large margin—they will simply laugh at us, keep the men as long as they can, and say, "Well, what are you going to do about it?"

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Just for a question.

Mr. FESS. I am in sympathy with what the gentleman is saying and I am wondering what is the argument for not demobilizing the troops when they come back, at the time they come back.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Exactly. I do not see it, except that Gen. March is stubborn about it and is going to keep as many men as he can under arms as long as he can, and we are helping him do that right here, sir.

Mr. FESS. That does not seem possible.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It does not, but it is a fact.

Mr. FESS. There must be some grounds——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio, let us take the means we have of control by appropriation. The time of the emergency is over; we have blindly followed everything they have asked for in time of an emergency. When I was a soldier I soldiered and I obeyed orders, and when I legislate I want to legislate, and I do not want Peyton C. March to tell me what I have to legislate. Now, let us see some of the items in this bill. I will ask the gentleman to turn to page 2, "Contingencies of the Army," where you find an item for $1,000,000. Gentlemen, do you know what that item is for? It is to provide the salaries of the Bureau of Sales of Surplus Supplies.

Mr. HULINGS. Of what?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of sales of surplus supplies. Here is a bureau that directs the policy of the disposing of the surplus supplies. The chief of that bureau testified, Mr. Chairman, and he said that he had to have this appropriation, that he needed it. Why? Because he said he had to pay his assistants a higher salary. We asked him what salary his assistants were getting, and they are getting $10,000 a year. His salary is $25,000 a year. I will ask my colleagues to carefully read his testimony as soon as the printed hearings are available.

Now, let me tell you what this bureau is doing. They testify that if it were not for them the surplus supplies of the Army would be dumped on the market and that it would disturb industry and that the Government would not receive the highest price. So we asked him how he disposed of his copper, and he said that he took his copper, turned it over to the copper people, and they would dispose of it each month, 10 per cent of the amount they sold; that we would take the price they got for their copper and we would pay them for selling the copper, and in that way we would not disturb the market—incidentally cinch the copper monopoly. So here we have the copper people who sold us this copper and made a profit at the time they sold to the Government now being paid a commission to sell it in such a manner that it will not disturb their profits. That is the copper. Now, let us see what this $25,000 beauty says about meats and foodstuffs. We have got I do not know how many millions of pounds of bacon, surplus bacon, and millions of cans of corned beef and roast-beef hash. This quantity is surplus and to be sold. We asked him why he did not dispose of it. "Oh," he said, "that is a very perplexing question," and he said that he had sought the advice of the packers and they told him that the American people could not eat bacon which the Government bought for the soldiers. [Laughter.] They said that this bacon was salted for three days and smoked I do not know how many days, and the people could not eat it. I have often eaten it and can say it is excellent. Then we asked what is to be done. "Well," he said, "perhaps we can send it back to the packers to have it recured." He said that we could not sell corned-beef hash and the roast beef because it was in 6-pound cans and there was no family in the country who could use 6 pounds of corned-beef hash. Evidently this corps of experts are not familiar with vital statistics or appetites of families. We asked him what he was going to do with it. He said he thought he might find a market in Roumania or Bosnia or Herzegovina or some other country like that. The gentleman does not know that those countries never use canned beef; that they use very little, if any, meat; that you could not find a can opener in all of Roumania, and yet we are paying this gentleman $25,000 and his assistants $10,000 a year each for expert advice. Perhaps when we increase the salaries we will get better advice.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In just a minute. He said that he had sent out several hundred circulars to dispose of this product, and we asked him to whom he had sent these circulars. He said, "To the Salvation Army." Perhaps he does not know the Salvation Army specializes in doughnuts and not in bacon. It surprises me he did not offer this bacon to some Jewish synagogue. [Laughter.] So here we have an article which, let us concede for the sake of argument, is difficult to dispose of, and with all his $10,000 advisers and experts he is not able to sell it. Well, I will tell the Director of the Sales of Surplus Supplies that if he will put that stuff on the market in New York City or Philadelphia or Boston he will find that the bellies of the hungry people are in a receptive mood, and they will be able to digest Army bacon. It may interfere with the profits of the packers, but I am not interested in that. Now let us see another item——

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will for a question.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Is there any reason why these 6-pound packages might not be disposed of in the various State institutions, penitentiaries, hospitals, and institutions of learning throughout the country? Do not they buy in wholesale quantities because they buy for innumerable people?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Absolutely—restaurants, boarding houses, hotels, camps—there is a ready market right now; but we must maintain this office so as to expend this million dollars.

Mr. VARE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. For a question.

Mr. VARE. Would not that have a tendency to reduce the cost of living if that was disposed of all over the country?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Yes; and give a surplus of fresh meat.

Mr. VARE. Of course, that might interfere with the profits of the packers.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Well, it would. Another item, Mr. Chairman; the Director of Sales gave us a beautiful chart showing the sales of various articles, and he had sold some aviation supplies, and we find that they had on hand a great many surplus planes made by the Curtiss people. These planes had been on the market, Mr. Chairman, and the Curtiss people served notice on the Government that if they should sell these planes they would sue the Government for breach of contract. Just how it would be done I do not know, neither do I know on what theory. At any rate there was considerable negotiations and correspondence concerning these planes.

In other words, the Curtiss people did everything possible to prevent the sale of these planes until the Director of Sales decided it would be as well to sell planes to the Curtiss people. So we find our experts deciding to sell, having at heart the best interests of the Government, 4,608 OX–5 motors, for which we paid $1,900 each, for $400 each; 1,616 Curtiss JN–4, for which we paid $5,700 each, for $400 each; 1,100 standard J, for which we paid $4,250 each, for $200 each, without motor.

So that we got something like $2,700,000 for this sale through this board of experts for the same articles for which we paid the same people $22,631,200.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. As I understand, the experts, as the gentleman calls them, were frightened into this kind of proceeding by threat of suit against the Government. I thought every schoolboy knew that the Government could not be sued.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. A little difference like that would make no difference to this commission.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I see.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I want to say that the sales up to $100,000 are made through the various branches of the Army, and all sales of $100,000 are cleared, as he says, through his office.

Now, gentlemen, when you get the hearings, perhaps some members of the committee may get the impression that on one item of sales we could save $10,000,000. This item is an item for machine tools, and the Ordnance Department said it would cost $8,000,000 to sluice these machines, or oil them. When the director was asked about it he did not know whether they had to be sluiced or oiled, and did not say whether or not it was necessary. He admitted he did not know whether these machines could be sold at best advantage without sluicing or not. When we reach the item I shall move, if no one else does, to reduce that $1,000,000 to $250,000, and perhaps we can get some business men who can draw less charts and tables, theorize less, less chummy with the copper and meat people, but who have horse sense and business ability to dispose of this property to the best interest of the Government and the people.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I want to ask him if he can conceive of some other amendment which will insure that the Government gets the benefit of these surplus supplies? They are being wasted now, it seems. We ought to save to the Government all we can get out of them.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Then the gentleman will agree with me that when this commission sells $27,000,000 of supplies for $2,700,000 to the same people they bought them from, that is not conserving the interests of the Government?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I am in hearty accord with the gentleman, and I am anxious that he offer some amendment to remedy that evil.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Another item that I want to call to the committee's attention is the "Air Service." I want to say that I have the highest regard for Gen. Menoher as a gallant officer, as an able general, as an expert on artillery and infantry, but when it comes to aviation he does not know a thing about it. And if you do not believe me, read the testimony. Gentlemen, it was pathetic to hear Gen. Menoher, the officer in charge of this service and intrusted to spend millions of dollars. He does not know a flying machine from a freight car. But he is the representative of the General Staff, and the General Staff has been fighting aviation ever since we started and is keeping up its scrap now. And the committee in its wisdom and good judgment reduced the item from $83,000,000 to $15,000,000. I expect to move another reduction of $5,000,000.

Now, let us look at the Aviation Service. The Secretary of War appeared before the committee, and in a very brief statement told us that he would not go into the question of policy. He told us about getting the men home, and the one recommendation that he made was that the future of the United States was at stake unless we purchased an aviation field at Dayton, Ohio. A field into which we have already dumped millions. Now, he wants to buy that field. And in comes Gen. Menoher and also asks to buy this field. The necessity for it was not explained to the committee. Before long we will be asked to buy Selfridge Field, on which we spent millions of dollars. It was a swamp and below water level. We drained it and made a habitable place of it, and spent our money there; and now they either have to give this land back to the proprietors or else buy it at their figure.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Which one of these fields is it that is part of a flood reservoir that is liable to be taken over by the State and flooded at any time?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Possibly it is not the Selfridge Field. The department had a sympathetic feeling for swamps. But the one I have referred to we have got to take back or buy it at an exorbitant figure. As I have said before on the floor of this House, we will never build up an aviation field in this country by buying land and spending millions first to drain land and then millions to buy that same land at an enhanced price because we made it suitable.

Gen. Mitchell, a gallant officer, one of the very few Regular Army officers who flew across the line, testified before the committee and told us that we had made no progress in lighter-than-air ships; that we were far behind in that style of ships; that we had no plans, no program. That we had nothing started. They testified that everything we had practically now was junk. Millions gone and not even a blue print of an up-to-date flying ship or plane.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I will.

Mr. LITTLE. Were there any graduates of West Point among the American aces?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Gen. Mitchell is not a graduate of West Point, although I may be wrong in that. No; there were not; perhaps one.

The question came up before the committee as to the advancement of our boys who were flying, why they were not given the J. M. A. and the M. A. rank. A colonel on Gen. Menoher's staff had the audacity to stand up before this committee and say, "We could not give them the M. A. test in Europe because it took so much time."

There is no such thing as an M. A. test. You get the M. A. rank automatically in three years. Then he said the J. M. A. test would take time. The test which our boys took at Issadoun, after taking advanced flying, was five times more difficult than the J. M. A. test. But that is a matter that has no bearing on this bill, and I will take that up at another time.

Gen. Menoher testified that he had to cooperate with the Navy in the matter of development and experimentation; that he had a joint board with the Navy, and that a good deal of production could be carried on along with the Navy; that regardless of the size of the Army an air service had to be kept up to a certain standard and size; and yet, when asked if he would support a separate air service, he said, "No"—because Gen. March is not for it, I suppose. When we arrive at this item of $15,000,000 I shall move to amend to reduce it to $10,000,000. Ten million dollars is enough to carry the Air Service on for the next fiscal year, to see what we are going to do, to decide upon a logical policy for our Air Service, to create a separate service, including the Army and the Navy, and Marine Corps, and the Post Office Department, and the Department of the Interior, which now wants planes, so that we can economize and not have overlapping services and really develop an aircraft industry in this country. To-day we are just as far behind in aviation as we were in 1917. We have squandered millions of dollars—I have said it many times on the floor of this House—and we have nothing to show for it except junk. We have not a pursuit plane; we have not a pursuit motor. We have 12,000 Liberty motors on hand. Gen. Menoher testified that he had one or two individual inquiries about the motors, but they are not able to sell a motor to any foreign country.

Another matter to which I wish to call the attention of the committee is the matter of military post exchanges. The director of that office appeared before the committee and asked for over $5,000,000, of which he wanted to use $1,000,000, gentlemen, to buy the buildings erected on cantonments by the Red Cross and the Young Men's Christian Association. Why, Mr. Chairman, when the American people gave their donations to the Red Cross and the Young Men's Christian Association they did not give them to those organizations as organizations, but they gave the money to be spent for the American soldiers. It was their gift direct to the Army; those buildings belong to the American Army or the soldiers and not to the Red Cross or the Young Men's Christian Association, and the Red Cross and the Young Men's Christian Association can not say to the Army, "Buy these buildings from us," and we should not appropriate for that purpose. It is wrong. The Red Cross and the Young Men's Christian Association hold these buildings, perhaps in trust, but they belong to the Government; they belong to the Army and to the soldiers. I do not believe that the idea originated with either of these organizations. The committee did not allow this item to the Bureau of Post Exchanges, page 39, and instead of $5,875,000 the committee allows $150,000. But I wanted to bring this matter to your attention, so that this effort will not be repeated and so that no society or war organization may have a misapprehension as to its rights. I maintain that those buildings belong to the American soldiers right where they are, and the Red Cross and the Young Men's Christian Association have not the right to remove a single plank or nail from those buildings. They are the direct gift by the American people to the soldier boys of this country.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the committee recommended an appropriation of $150,000 for that purpose?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. No.

Mr. McKENZIE. But they did recommend that amount to Army post exchanges?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Yes. I am bringing this out—what they asked for—so that there will be no misunderstanding on future appropriations.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. If I understood the gentleman correctly, earlier in his remarks, he spoke of the disposition to hold troops in this country without demobilizing them. Is that something new? I thought there was great haste about demobilizing troops in the country for certain purposes. In New York City certain troops were wanted for the purpose of parading, and troops were held without being demobilized, so that they could parade. Has there been a change of attitude on the part of the department in that line?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I can not say that there has been a change of attitude on the part of the department, but I will ask the gentleman from Connecticut, who is one of the best military experts in this House, why should we have an Army of 535,000 men in the United States to-day?

Mr. TILSON. I was wondering whether there was a change of attitude in that respect, or what the trouble is.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I believe they are demobilizing rapidly now, as these men come in; but I say they will retard and delay demobilization when we have received the last number of men from Europe.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. The gentleman will recall the fact that Gen. March testified that the number of men in camp—400,000 or 500,000 men in cantonments in this country—was due to the fact that the returning soldiers and new recruits were counted as part of them, so that very few of the original drafted men are now in camp.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. About 41,000 are new recruits.

Mr. HARRISON. Forty-eight thousand.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. That is not a large figure in comparison with 400,000.

Mr. HARRISON. There are 200,000 returning troops in the cantonments.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I will accept the gentleman's figures of 200,000; but I say we still have 150,000 too many, and that will bear out my contention that we are appropriating too much money here. If we get these men back at the rate of 360,000 a month, that will leave us on the 1st of July with nothing but an army of occupation in Europe, and the President told us that we would get them back by September. When we get them back we should demobilize them and cut down the figure set out in the national defense act. We should cut down the appropriation to make such action certain.

Mr. HARRISON. If we appropriate only for those who are not discharged, it does not make any difference whether we appropriate for 400,000 or 500,000, because we do not increase or decrease the number demobilized.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. That is absolutely correct, except that the gentleman has implicit trust and faith that the War Department will do that, and I have not. I think the General Staff will keep an army lingering up to the very last hour of the very last day of the four months' period. That is what I am trying to avoid.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Can the gentleman from New York tell me how many men are still in the camps and cantonments in this country who went into the service under the draft, or volunteered prior to the draft?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I can not tell the gentleman that. The greater percentage of the men are war soldiers, volunteers for the duration of the war, or drafted boys.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. But you can not give any indication as to how many are still held in the service in this country?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. No; but it goes up into the hundreds of thousands. We have something like 48,000 Regular troops who have enlisted since the war, and some of those have been sent overseas. The remainder of them are in this country. The greater part of the rest of the men in the cantonments and camps in this country are men who enlisted for the duration of the war, war soldiers, or draft soldiers.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. But you can not tell exactly the number of those men?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. No; because the Chief of Staff would not give us those figures.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. May I have five minutes more?

Mr. KAHN. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I want to point out that there is nothing in this bill which goes to the real question of preparedness or the reorganization of the Army. It is purely an appropriation bill. There is no provision made for training. The sole purpose of this bill is to maintain this Army, and I believe that nothing constructive can possibly be carried out during this fiscal year.

Most of the time and effort of the department will be taken up with the actual demobilization, and questions pertaining to demobilization, so that we can cut off two or three hundred million dollars more of this bill, and still demobilize more rapidly than we will if we give too much money and put too much power in the hands of the General Staff. You may say that we have no right to do that by indirection, but I say that according to our system of government, where powers are divided under a system of checks and balances, the power of appropriation is given to us for that very purpose, in order to prevent the Executive department of the Government from abusing its powers. Inasmuch as it is the intent of the Congress to reduce the Army to the figure provided in the national defense act, I say that the way to do it is to appropriate only such an amount that will make nothing else possible. I say that no man who votes for this full amount will be able properly to stand up on the floor of this House and complain about the retarding of the demobilization. The way to do is to get at the very meat of the thing, cut it down, and you will see that your Army will be demobilized. [Applause.]

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I wish to say that the difference between the figures in this bill and the figures reported in the bill before the last Congress does not represent the change of a dollar in money saved or in the number of troops to be retained in the service. The appropriations in this bill are founded on exactly the same principle as the appropriations made in the bill before the last Congress. We are appropriating for the men that we believe will be held on an average during the year. We are appropriating for men who will not be discharged and not for an Army of any size whatever. As matters stood in the last session of Congress it seemed wise to appropriate for an Army of 500,000 men and so many officers, and at this session of Congress it has seemed wise to make the appropriation for 400,000 men, but in neither instance was the Army fixed at either of these figures. As soon as peace is proclaimed, by operation of the wording of the laws emergency acts pass out and the national defense act comes in. The number of enlisted men under that act can not exceed 175,000.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will it disturb the gentleman to ask him a question right there?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it not a fact that what you have stated just now represents the views and is the policy of the Congress of the United States? And is it not also a fact that the War Department asked us to appropriate in the last Congress, and that they insist that we ought to appropriate in this Congress, for an Army of 509,000 men, and insist that it is the duty of the Congress to pass such legislation as will give them that Army of 509,000 men? Is not that where the cleavage comes between the War Department and the Congress?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Virginia indulge the Chair a moment? The Chair begs to notify the members of the committee that it is in violation of the rules of the House for Members to address each other in the second person, and the present occupant of the chair will enforce that rule.

Mr. HARRISON. We have in the military service at present 1,300,000 men. It is the duty of this Government to pay them what the law prescribes. It is the duty of this Government to furnish them subsistence, and it is the duty of this Government to transport them according to the necessities of the Government from one place to another, to provide for their transportation. Now, the supposed saving in this bill from the appropriation bill of last session is the difference in those three items, the difference in the pay of the Army, its subsistence, and its transportation. Yet while we are providing for only 400,000 men, we have in the Army 1,300,000 men, so that we are taking the responsibility of not providing for the pay of 1,300,000 men, because we are providing for the pay of only 400,000 men, and we can only do that on the assumption that the men will be discharged in accordance with the proposition of the Government. Now, the War Department has taken the view that it is dangerous at this time not to make provision for 500,000 men; that it is dangerous not to provide for an Army of 500,000 men on the average. We are at war. We have disturbing elements in this country. We have not reinstated the National Guard as yet, and the Government has asked us to provide for 500,000 men, not that it expects to have 500,000 men, but under possibilities that it may have 500,000 men.

If it should so turn out that the estimates of the Government are correct, and the appropriation by Congress is not in accordance with the estimates, who is the loss going to fall upon? Why, upon the soldiers, the men who have fought our battles, these men that we are holding in the service. Their subsistence will be cut and their transportation and pay will be cut. It does not mean that because the Government asked for 500,000 men that we are to have 500,000 men. Under the terms of the national defense act we can not have 500,000 men. The minute peace is proclaimed, that minute we go back to the national defense act. We would have under the national defense act 175,000 men.

When the Government comes before Congress and says it is safe to make provision for 500,000 men, it is only acting prudently; not that it asks for an army of 500,000 men, because there is not a line or word of legislation in the bill that would justify holding 500,000 men. It simply asks that this Congress so provide that if the necessities of the Government require it they will have enough money to pay 500,000 men and enough for their subsistence.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Sure.

Mr. KEARNS. Has it not been repeatedly stated by the Secretary of War that he intended to have all of our soldiers out of Europe by the latter part of September?

Mr. HARRISON. It has been stated by a higher authority.

Mr. KEARNS. The President?

Mr. HARRISON. The President met the Military Affairs Committee in Paris, and he was asked the question and he said, "It is my confident hope and expectation to have every soldier in Europe home by the 1st of September."

Mr. KEARNS. If that is true how could they have an average Army through the year of 500,000 men?

Mr. HARRISON. The gentleman asks a pertinent question—I do not believe they can. If things go as they should go we will not have 300,000 men, and yet to show how men can differ——

Mr. KEARNS. If the gentleman will pardon another question. Is it not a fact that we have a great many thousand men held in the camps and cantonments in the United States that have been there practically for a year?

Mr. HARRISON. Not according to my advices. There may be some ground of complaint, but I do not know this. Men in the service are anxious to get out and they see only their side. On the other hand, the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff, and all the officers charged with the duty of releasing the men, insist that all possible diligence is being used to this end. I do not believe men are being held in the service so that officers may hold their commissions. I have found officers with commissions unable to secure their release. An examination of the statistics of the camps and cantonments will reveal the fact that the situation as it appears is not the true situation. I have not the figures by me, as the debate this afternoon was unexpected, but if I remember aright there appear to be in the camps and cantonments about four or five hundred thousand men. This would seem an unreasonably large number, but we must reflect that in this number are the new recruits, some 50,000, and all the men returned from overseas, held for a few day awaiting their discharges. I should not say over 150,000 or 200,000 represent those actually held in the service. A large proportion of these are required in the hospitals to care for the wounded and the sick. Others are held to discharge the necessary military duties of the camps, so that those brought from overseas may be returned speedily to their homes and their work.

It is only right that those who have been to the firing line should be given a precedence in the order of discharge. Many are retained in order that the men who did go on the firing line may be discharged and sent home to their usual vocations. The officers have protested to our committee that not a man in this country is being retained beyond the necessities of the occasion for his retention.

Now, we can not tell about the complaints of these various men. A great many men think they ought to be discharged, and they think it is a great hardship that they are not discharged. If it is a question between retaining men who have been in this country and retaining men who have been over in France, I think we all agree that the men who have been in France and rendered service there should be given the first privilege of being discharged. In appropriating for 400,000 or 500,000 or 600,000 we are not spending one dollar more—I do not care how you figure it—than is necessary. How many men are we going to have in the service on an average during the year? That is the question. Some say 400,000, some say 500,000, some say 600,000; but the appropriation, for that matter, does not mean that the money is going to be spent. I say it is far safer and far wiser to appropriate money, so there shall be money here to pay these men in case they are not demobilized as rapidly as we hope.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I will.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman has had more experience on the committee than I have. In his experience has he ever known an appropriation for the Army turned back into the Treasury?

Mr. HARRISON. A number of times. Previous to the declaration of war an appropriation for machine guns was made and not a dollar was spent.

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. DENT. So far as the pay of the Army is concerned, under the law if you have not the men to pay the money must be returned to the Treasury.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. May I ask the gentleman from Virginia to inquire of the gentleman from Alabama—I know the law requires the money to be refunded to the Treasury—but in his experience how many times have appropriations for the pay of the Army been kept lower than the limit and the balance refunded to the Treasury?

Mr. HARRISON. I can not tell the gentleman.

Mr. DENT. I really do not understand what my colleague on the committee means by that. If we appropriated for an Army of 100,000 men for the fiscal year and had only 75,000 men, the War Department would have to return the difference between the upkeep cost of the 75,000 men and the 100,000 men to the Treasury, or the officers would be guilty of embezzlement.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But they make every effort to expend it up to the very last moment.

Mr. DENT. They can not expend it if they have not the men.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is just the point. We do not want them to get the men.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. ALMON. Do I understand the gentleman to be complaining that the Military Committee should have recommended appropriations for an Army of an average of 500,000 men instead of 400,000 men?

Mr. HARRISON. I said I thought it was safer to make that appropriation, but I agreed with the committee that in view of recent developments 400,000 would be safe. But it does not make a bit of difference whether we appropriate for 500,000 or 400,000 men. We are not authorizing an Army of either 500,000 or 400,000. When peace is declared the Army can not exceed 175,000.

Mr. ALMON. I understood the gentleman to say that if this appropriation which has been recommended by the Military Committee for an Army of 400,000 men on an average was not sufficient that the soldiers would be the sufferers, and I wanted to know if that could not be provided for by a deficiency bill, in the event that it was not sufficient.

Mr. HARRISON. It could be provided for by a deficiency bill, but who is going to take care of the soldiers until we get the deficiency bill passed? That is the point. It just shows how much of guesswork this all is, when I recall the fact that at the last Congress in discussing this matter I tried to point out to the members of the Committee of the Whole House that the average number would not be 335,000, and I was ridiculed and scouted to some extent by my friends on the other side. I would like to refresh the memory of gentlemen for a moment or two by reading something that was said at that time. One very distinguished gentleman said:

> All the criticism that has been leveled at the bill for being too lavish falls to the ground, because it is a dead certainty that whether we want it or not we will have more men in the service next year than even this bill provides for. It is a physical impossibility for it to be otherwise.

Those are the words of the gentleman from Kansas, Mr. ANTHONY. Another distinguished gentleman, Mr. MANN, said that nobody who could add two and two and make it four but would say that under the figures of the bill it would be absolutely impossible to have as few men as 500,000 on the average. My very distinguished friend, the chairman of this committee, Mr. KAHN, said the War Department always took matters too optimistically, and he was sure there would not be as few as 500,000 men. But here he comes in with this bill and urges the Congress to cut it down to 400,000 men, because they all see that their foresight on the subject of how many men we will have in the service has been at fault, and that nobody can tell how many there will be. In this respect I wish to say that the fact that we can go down now to 400,000 men is not due to any Republican economy, but is due to Democratic efficiency. We have reduced the number. By virtue of efficient administration in the War Department we have not only done that which one distinguished gentleman said was a physical impossibility but we have done that which another distinguished gentleman said anybody who could add two and two and make four would say could not be done. It is Democratic efficiency that has done this, they must all admit. But I do not care whether it is 400,000 or 500,000 or 300,000 men. The sole proposition is this, that we should make an appropriation to protect our soldiers from having their pay withheld or their subsistence withheld.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman does not seriously contend that one soldier would lose his pay or go without food or transportation, assuming that the appropriation would fall short.

Mr. HARRISON. Perhaps the gentleman would take care of those soldiers who had no food, but there is no one else that I can think of who can do it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does the gentleman wish to convey the information that unless we appropriate——

Mr. HARRISON. Here is the only thing I meant to insist on: That if we do not make appropriations for their pay, they are not going to be paid. There is no other way to get it to them.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Can not we always pass a deficiency bill?

Mr. HARRISON. I will ask the gentleman to be generous and do it himself.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it not a fact that the pay of the Army is one of the great items of this bill?

Mr. HARRISON. There is subsistence and transportation, dependent upon the size of the Army.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it not true that in the estimate submitted to our committee by the War Department that, for instance, take the Engineer Corps, the Signal Corps, the Aviation Corps, for every possible branch the estimates were based on a proposed army of 509,000 men?

Mr. HARRISON. They wanted us to go ahead and make these appropriations now for what we would be called upon to do later, and that is to provide for the Engineer Corps, for the Aviation Corps, for the Transportation Corps. These were all left to be taken care of when we come to reorganize the Army. The only thing we have done in that respect is to postpone the appropriation until that time comes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Would the gentleman say that, under the national-defense act, which is the only law we have on the statute books fixing the size of the Army, under that law, the peace being signed, the troops home, demobilized, with an Army fixed at 175,000 men in the line, exclusive of the Quartermaster Corps and the Medical Corps and the Signal Corps, we should make appropriations, for instance, for the Engineer Corps on the basis of an Army of 509,000 men, when under the law it says we are to have an Army of 175,000 men? Now, if the gentleman will permit me, I agree with the gentleman about the unexpected efficiency in bringing the men home, and I hope that the gentleman from Virginia will join with us now in our effort to try to prevent extravagance.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Democratic Party can do it they are going to see to it you will not expend a dollar more than necessary, that is certain. On the declaration of peace we come to this national-defense act. That act is wholly unworkable, according to the testimony of Gen. March, Chief of Staff, and other officers who appeared before our committee, and it is going to be absolutely essential within the six months that the Overman Act is under operation to adopt a proper military policy, a permanent policy for this country. The present national-defense act would place the Air Service under the Signal Corps and destroy its efficiency. It would destroy the Tank Corps, it would destroy the Chemical Service Corps, and other corps which I do not just now recall. So if we are going to preserve the bureaus and the corps that have been found in this war to be essential to any efficient army we have got to legislate very soon upon some permanent peace policy. For my part I think that we can do nothing wiser than to go back to the old national-defense act as a basis and build on it. In spite of what the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] said this morning—that we made a great mistake in our national-defense preparations because we did not vote for his 250,000 Army amendment—the facts are that his amendment could not have possibly amounted to anything. The national-defense act authorized 175,000 men, and at the outbreak of the war we did not have anywhere near this number. The authorization of 250,000 would have therefore meant nothing. It might have displayed the desire to have an Army of that size without incurring the obligation of taxpayers to pay for it.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I will.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If the gentleman will permit me to remind him, I think it will recur to his memory that this 175,000 men were not all to be raised in one year, but were to be raised in five annual increments and only one increment had lapsed.

Mr. HARRISON. A great deal over 100,000 men were authorized, but we had not actually enrolled——

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Because the authorized strength had four-fifths of the increments to come in in four succeeding years.

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman yield to me? Where does the gentleman get that statement?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. He gets it from the law itself, as he recalls it.

Mr. DENT. That is the National Guard and not the Regular Army.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. This applies to the Regular Army, and one of the first things we did in the war-time legislation was to authorize the Secretary of War to raise the five increments at once to bring the Regular Army to its maximum strength.

Mr. GARNER. The only difference between the 175,000 and the 225,000 the gentleman from California wanted was a difference in numbers and not a difference in method.

Mr. HARRISON. The fact is that if he wanted the 225,000 men he would not have had the men. He might have had the authorized strength.

Mr. GARNER. As I understood the gentleman, the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] only wanted to increase the number and not change the method of raising it.

Mr. HARRISON. That is true.

Mr. GARNER. So there would not have been more men under his method than the 175,000?

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I offered was for an increase to 250,000 men.

Mr. HARRISON. At the time the war broke out the Regular Army was not enlisted anywhere near the strength authorized by the national-defense act.

Mr. GARNER. But it had to be raised under the same system as the 175,000 were raised?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, no.

Mr. GARNER. What system did you offer?

Mr. KAHN. Immediately.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] has the floor.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I submit to the Chair the gentleman permitted other gentlemen to interrupt him, and I am interrogating them.

May I ask the gentleman from California a question without being interrupted by the Chair, with the permission of the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. HARRISON. I said if you did not take much time.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield? If not, the Chair will maintain the right of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] to the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. I was pointing out that the authorized number had no bearing, because of the fact that the Army could not be recruited up to the strength that was authorized.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentlemen yield? I want the gentleman from Virginia, if he can, to explain the difference between the proposition of the gentleman from California and the present law calling for 175,000 men. The gentleman from Virginia has said that, while we had authorized 175,000 men, there were about 100,000 men in the Army.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Now he contends that if we had adopted the plan of the gentleman from California we would have only had that number of men, but the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] says his plan is different from the one on the statute books. Will the gentleman point out the difference?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not think there was any difference, except in the number.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I do not remember exactly the wording of the amendment I offered, but I do remember this much of it, that I offered the amendment for immediate increase of the Army to 250,000 men. I am going to send for a copy of the amendment and will get it exact.

Mr. HARRISON. The amendment would not have brought any more troops than those that already were in the Army.

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield to me?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. HARRISON. I do.

Mr. DENT. Whatever the language of the amendment offered by the gentleman from California may have been, the fact is that under the bill approved June 3, 1916, the Army was increased to 175,000 combatant men, and when we declared war on the 6th day of April, 1917, we had 127,000 officers and men. And so if we had had the amendment offered by the gentleman from California we would not have had the men or the officers in the Army.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield to me?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Having in mind the statement of the gentleman from Alabama that at the outbreak of the war the national-defense act authorized 175,000 combatant troops, and that we had only 127,000, will the gentleman from Virginia supplement the statement of his colleague from Alabama by explaining to him that under the terms of the law as it then stood the maximum authorization of 175,000 men was only to be reached at the end of five years from the date of the approval of the act, which was June 3, 1916, or just one year before we went into the war at all?

Mr. DENT. I can not agree with the gentleman.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. And one increment of the five had been raised, and only one. And at the meeting of the committee, attended by the Secretary of War, to propose war legislation, one of the first things written into the bill was authority to raise the other four increments at once and not wait four years.

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman from Virginia permit me to ask my colleague from Vermont a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield for that purpose?

Mr. HARRISON. How much time have I used?

The CHAIRMAN. Thirty-five minutes.

Mr. DENT. I want to ask the gentleman from Vermont if he means to state that under the national-defense act, approved June 3, 1916, it is provided for a maximum combatant Army of 175,000, and that the first year only one-fifth of them can be raised?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Not that one-fifth of them could be raised, but that the gain over the status of the Army then, at that time, to make up the 175,000, was to be so raised.

Mr. DENT. The gentleman is talking enigmas now.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I am trying to answer the gentleman.

Mr. DENT. I want to know if the gentleman means——

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I can not yield further.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] declines to yield further.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not think it makes any difference as to the technical feature. The fact is that at the time of the declaration of war the men were not recruited to the full authorized strength, and it does not make a picayune of difference whether 125,000 or 175,000 or 225,000 were authorized. The saving of this Republic was the provision in regard to the National Guard. It was our National Guard that furnished the nucleus under the national-defense act which enabled us to put some strength on the Mexican border, and which eventually enabled us to play so conspicuous a part in the war in Europe. I know of no more brilliant service rendered by any branch of the Army than was rendered by the National Guard on the blood-stained fields of France. [Applause.] It was the Rainbow Division, the Twenty-ninth Division, the Wildcat Division, the Twenty-sixth Division, the Twenty-eighth Division—all composed of the National Guard of this country—that carried the American flag to victory on every field that they fought, and it was the National Guard that served its great purpose, not only in the prewar time but at the time when the actual hostilities began. I know of no more gallant service rendered by any division than that of the division which came from my own State and the States of West Virginia and Pennsylvania.

The Twenty-ninth Division took its place in the Argonne fight, and the Twenty-ninth Division was very instrumental in terminating that battle in favor of American arms; and when I mention the Twenty-ninth Division I do it simply because it came from my own section. Gallant men from all sections were found in the National Guard divisions, and the National Guard divisions and the National Army divisions can challenge any work that was done by any of the Regular Army divisions over there. [Applause.] The Regular Army divisions were all made up of freshly recruited men, and they had no advantage over the National Guard or the National Army in that respect.

I think it would be a deplorable thing in time of peace to force the youth into compulsory military training. I followed the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] when he amended the National Army act in providing for the selective draft. I believed in war time it was the duty of every man to rally around the flag, and the proper way of raising an army was to raise it by the selective draft; but I do not agree with him if it is his proposition that in time of peace we shall force men into the military service, I do not care whether they are 18-year-old boys or whether they are 30 years old or any other age. [Applause.] In war time we have the right to call on the manhood of this country, but in peace times it seems to me a very poor substitute policy to compel men to leave their homes and their occupations to enter the military service, I do not care what euphonious name it may bear. If the 100,000 Army means that we are going to compel military service of the young men of this country, then for one I am opposed to it.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. BAER. I am not an authority on militarism, and I am trying to get it straight in my mind whether it makes any difference whether a man is a reservist or not in peace times if when we declare war he immediately becomes of the reserve corps; so that if he is in the reserve in peace times, when we do not have war, and he can not get into war, still in war times he is in the reserve. I am in favor of the gentleman's position, but I do not know how it works out.

Mr. HARRISON. I am not a sufficiently competent authority to explain that. [Laughter.]

As I say, I think we have a right in war time to compel military service, but when it comes to compelling military service in peace times it is an entirely different proposition, and of an army of 100,000 men means that we are going to compel all the young men of this country to enter the military service of this country, then I think we had better have a larger army and do away with compulsory military service. I favor, of course, military instruction in the colleges and academies and public schools, and in that I have the indorsement of the Secretary of War in his testimony before the committee. To that extent I think this Congress can well go. But to provide for an army of 100,000 men, with compulsory military service, it seems to me is against the ideals of our country.

I desire to say that the billions of dollars that we have appropriated can all be found. Anybody who goes over to Europe will come back impressed with the magnitude of the work that America has done there. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] has detailed here in eloquent words and glowing language the work of America on French soil; I do not care whether it is the Military Committee that goes over there, or a partisan investigating committee, or a body of visiting statesmen, they will all come back impressed with the magnificent work that America has done, in the supply branch, at the ports of embarkation and on the battle field. [Applause.] I think it was rather in poor taste for this Congress to determine to send over a partisan investigating committee to investigate what our brave and true men have done over in that country.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman believes, however, that there are some things on this side of the water that might well be investigated?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, a few things; but when you assail the Secretary of War you assail the men whom he employed to do the work. You can not separate the Secretary of War from the men who had charge of those works.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, for a question.

Mr. McKENZIE. My colleague does not mean to say that it is intended that this investigating committee shall investigate the character of the work done by the men in the Military Establishment. That is not the idea.

Mr. HARRISON. Is not it? I did not know what the idea was. I knew it was a Republican committee, and I did not know what they were going to do.

Mr. McKENZIE. My colleague will admit that there is a great deal of difference between the work of the soldier on the other side and the work of the men who had the contracts on this side, perhaps.

Mr. HARRISON. The men over there did wonderful work, I do not care whether it was on the field of battle or in the supply depots. They ran the great plants over there; they established those ports of debarkation over there. They did work that is simply marvelous, as you will agree when you go over there and contemplate it. It seems to me it is in mighty poor taste to send a partisan committee to investigate it; but I think I can speak for those men over there when I say that they will gladly welcome any investigation that you may institute. It was for this reason that I voted for the resolution.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I understood from the President himself that, treaty or no treaty, there was no intention on his part or on the part of the administration to keep any soldiers in any part of Europe, occupied territory or otherwise. He has stated that most emphatically, and if that is the case it seems to me we need have no fears that the treaty of peace will contain any provision warranting our doing police duty over there or retaining our soldiers there for any purpose. I hope, though, that something better will come out of that treaty than is indicated by the somewhat hopeless cry of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]. All he seems to think now is that we must get the boys home. There are two things, though, about that treaty of peace that I think we can contemplate without any worry. The first is that the Germans do not like it, and the second is that Americans are not going to lie down on the job until they complete the work they set out to do. [Applause.] We are not figuring on territory. It is a matter of no concern to us what is done about that, but our allies are concerned, and no treaty of peace can be reached without such matters being considered. They have got to settle their boundaries, and the American Government can be a beneficent factor in acting as adviser and friend. We are not concerned in their boundaries except to bring about peace.

Mr. EMERSON. Has not the President already taken a stand on some of their territorial questions?

Mr. HARRISON. The President may have decided to act as a friendly advisor. It makes no difference to this country whether the Italians or anybody else get certain territory, but if it is necessary as a member of the peace council to advise along certain lines I have no doubt he has done it.

Mr. EMERSON. He has indulged in some pretty strong language.

Mr. HARRISON. There are two things which I think that treaty emphasizes, which my colleague from Kentucky brought out this morning. There are two things that this country is vitally interested in. One is that the settlement of all international disputes should be by arbitration, and the next is the limitation upon the armaments of all countries.

We do not want a great military establishment over here, but we want to say to the people of the earth, "You shall not threaten our security and our safety by having great armaments over there." In that respect it seems to me there is something more hopeful than the gentleman from California has been able to find. He only wants to come home and get away from Europe. He seems to have nothing else to suggest. Is this all that American blood, so freely shed, can buy—a safe conduct home?

Let us hope that when we bring the American flag home we will bring a peace treaty which for the years to come will mean our future security under all the changes in the times to come.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I will.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. How does the gentleman reconcile the reduction of armament and our having a Navy second to none in the world?

Mr. HARRISON. I believe we have not a Navy second to none in the world.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is the gentleman speaking for the administration?

Mr. HARRISON. I understood that program has been abandoned, but I am not up on naval matters.

Mr. IGOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. IGOE. Does the gentleman see how the chairman of the committee can reconcile his views—that before we went into the war we should have about 250,000 men to be prepared, and now, when America is to stand alone, notwithstanding all the lessons and experience we have had, he thinks the Army could get along with 100,000 men?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know. Mr. Chairman, I have been so interrupted that I can not keep the thread of what I am trying to say. I was glad to vote for the proposition before this body the other day thanking our men for the efficient work that they had done. Whoever goes over to that country will come back greatly impressed, magnificently impressed, with what has been done. Even when I arrived at Brest, that much-maligned territory, the first person I met was that gallant soldier, Gen. Butler, son of the distinguished chairman of the naval committee. [Applause.] He has done wonders for that place. He has transformed it from being a mudhole into a place that makes as good a showing as any other camp in Europe. What I say about Gen. Butler is true of all the other generals in the several camps that I visited. They not only had a military duty to perform but they had great outside work to perform in taking care of the soldiers and meeting all the requirements of war. To the eternal glory of the American Army I do not believe any committee will find that a single American officer has stained his honor in any way or at any time or under any conditions. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, if I have any time I reserve it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used 50 minutes.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to address the House in general debate if I can make some arrangement with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] in regard to time.

Mr. McKENZIE. I will yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I thought we had some time on this side and I am a member of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is a member of the committee and if he asks for recognition the Chair will recognize him.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama has informed me that he will not desire any time under general debate. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] would like to have 30 minutes and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] would like to have 10 minutes. I am perfectly willing that they should have that time. I presume they are entitled to it in their own right. I have consumed all my time, but when they have concluded I shall ask the committee to rise, and then take up the bill again under the five-minute rule on Wednesday.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman from California a question?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. DENT. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] want his 30 minutes this evening?

Mr. KAHN. This evening.

Mr. DENT. And then the gentleman from Kansas wants 10 minutes?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. May I interrupt the gentleman? In view of the lateness of the hour, I do not want to keep the Members here, and I will wait until some more appropriate time.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] is not on the floor just now, therefore I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Thereupon the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 5227, the military appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend and revise my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend and revise his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia makes the same request. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

CLOSE OF GENERAL DEBATE.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I understand from the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] that he does not desire any time under general debate. Therefore I move that the general debate be now considered closed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California moves that general debate upon this bill be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I have the privilege of presenting the conference report on the bill H. R. 2480, the Indian appropriation bill, some time between now and midnight, and that it be printed in the RECORD under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER], chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, asks unanimous consent that the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill, H. R. 2480, may be printed in the RECORD if presented at any time up to midnight to-night. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

VICTOR BERGER.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to vacate, back to the amendment stage, the proceedings by which the House passed the House resolution No. 6, providing for the appointment of a committee to report on the right of VICTOR BERGER to a seat in the House. My reason for making this request is that, owing to an error on the part of the former Clerk of the House in copying the name from the certificate, it appeared in the printed roll as "VICTOR BERGER," whereas the correct name is "VICTOR L. BERGER." If my request is granted, I shall move to amend the resolution so as to have the record correct.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I am not entirely clear as to what the gentleman desires to do. Is it important that it be done at this time? Can not the gentleman bring it up in the morning?

Mr. DALLINGER. I would like very much to have the matter disposed of at this time.

Mr. MONDELL. I realize that; but I think the gentleman might bring it up in the morning.

Mr. DALLINGER. I will state, Mr. Speaker, it will be very difficult for me to be here when the house convenes in the morning, on account of a hearing before the Committee on Elections No. 1 on the Kansas City case.

Mr. GARRETT. May I ask wherein it is important to make that amendment, anyway? Of what consequence is it?

Mr. DALLINGER. Because the resolution followed the printed roll of the House, and described the name as "VICTOR BERGER," whereas the name in the certificate from the governor of Wisconsin is "VICTOR L. BERGER."

Mr. GARRETT. It is just a question of identification.

Mr. DALLINGER. I think it would be well to have the record correct.

Mr. MONDELL. I suggest, if it is not important that action be taken now, the gentleman withdraw his request for the present.

Mr. DALLINGER. Of course, if the gentleman from Wyoming intends to object, I will withdraw my request at this time.

Mr. BLANTON. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 34 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Tuesday, June 10, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, June 10, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we thank Thee that we have lived through the days that have shown that men count something dearer to them than life. We thank Thee that men have been willing to stake their fortunes and their lives upon great ideals. We thank Thee that Thou hast given Thy blessing to those who have consecrated themselves to the higher things. We pray that we may catch the spirit of all the men who have sacrificed and suffered and died, that we, too, may carry on that work, counting not our lives dear unto us, that we may fulfill the divine purpose in us and accomplish God's will in this great Nation. Bless us to-day in the discharge of the duties that are upon us. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a joint memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House joint memorial 6.

TERRITORY OF ALASKA, FOURTH SESSION.

To the honorable the Congress of the United States:

We, your memorialists, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, in fourth regular session assembled, do most respectfully and earnestly represent that:

Whereas the salt-herring industry of Alaska is of the greatest importance to the people of the Territory of Alaska as well as to the people of the United States, as this industry has steadily grown from an output of 8,956 barrels in 1915, 18,079 barrels in 1916, and 22,557 barrels in 1917, to 105,394 barrels during the past year; and

Whereas with the ending of the World War it will be impossible for this industry to be sustained without governmental aid to offset the advantage European producers have in the New York market on account of low trans-Atlantic freight rates; and

Whereas the cost of shipping a barrel of salt fish from points in Europe to New York or Philadelphia is but $2 per barrel against the cost of over $6 per barrel for freight on Alaska herring to the same points; and

Whereas the fishing industry of Alaska should be fostered, built up, and expanded:

Therefore we, your memorialists, would respectfully pray that the Congress of the United States pass the necessary legislation, placing an import duty on foreign salt herring of not less than $3 per barrel, as the only hope of the survival of this important industry seems to be through protection of the extent of this freight differential.

Be it resolved by the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, That copies of this memorial be furnished by the secretary of the Territory of Alaska to the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, to the Representatives and Senators in Congress from the State of Washington, and to the Delegate to Congress from Alaska; and be it further

Resolved, That the Delegate to Congress from Alaska be, and the same hereby is, urged to give this matter his attention to the end that the necessary relief may be granted.

And for this relief we, your memorialists, will ever pray.

Adopted by the House April 19, 1919.

Speaker of the House.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I do not want to offer an objection at this time except to make one observation. I am not entirely familiar with the Senate rules, and I am asking more as a matter of information. I am so much interested in the real results from this session of Congress in the matter of adopting a Federal budget that I feel any action that did not reach the very core of the situation that has the approval of the Senate might retard rather than advance it.

Personally I feel that the appointment of a committee of Senators confined alone to Members of this body can not get very far. It is a subject on which, it seems to me, any commission should include the membership of both Houses as well as representatives of the departmental activities. I can not conceive of a result from the adoption of a resolution which gives to the Senate the responsibility of formulating a budget system when all measures for revenue, as is well known, must originate in the House. Yet we are taking upon ourselves the responsibility of evolving a budget system. I have lived in a budget atmosphere in public life for the last three or four years, and I am very anxious to see Congress prepare and complete a budget act, but the passage of this resolution, I am very much afraid, would not advance it very far.

Mr. POMERENE. It seems to me I have seen something to the effect that the House has taken some action in this behalf. Is the Senator advised as to what they have done?

Mr. EDGE. I know nothing further than the statement in the newspapers that a bill has been introduced in the House, with which I am not familiar.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, this matter has been introduced this morning?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is the report of a committee, and there is a request for unanimous consent for present consideration.

Mr. WARREN. I object.

Mr. KNOX. I hope the Senator will allow me to make a brief statement before he insists on his objection.

Mr. WARREN. I withhold the objection then. I wish to say that I do not object to the resolution with any intention of sidetracking it. I am very anxious to get the consideration of an appropriation bill and I thought perhaps the resolution would lead to a debate of some length.

Mr. KNOX. If it does, I will withdraw it.

Mr. WARREN. Very well, then, I withdraw my objection for the present.

Mr. KNOX. I wish to reply to the Senator from New Jersey. This resolution was introduced by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK]. Before he introduced the resolution he informed the Committee on Rules, of which he is a member, that he had made an effort to secure the consent of the House to a joint committee, but he had made no progress in that direction, because the House desired to proceed, as he was informed, along its own lines. We thought if we could not get the better method—and I agree that would be a better method—we ought to undertake something on our own account.

This is only a special committee, not a permanent committee, and a special committee which will be filled automatically by the committee on committees from the two parties and instructed to make a report in a very brief period. I can see no possible harm that can come to the cause of formulating a proper budget system by this effort, and some good might come from it. It might be possible that after this committee is formed it would secure some sort of cooperation with the House that might eventually lead to joint action by both bodies.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, far be it from me to retard it in any way, but, as I recall, the House did go on record at the last session in passing in the latter part of the session a resolution similar to the type of resolution I briefly referred to. The Senate went on record by passing a similar resolution introduced by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON]. Therefore both Houses at the last session, although not on the same measure, went on record favoring the type of commission which I think absolutely necessary if we are going to produce a final budget measure.

I have no particular objection to the effort that is being made by the Senator from Illinois, as explained by the Senator from Pennsylvania, except that I do feel that we should put it up to the House. I have no knowledge as to how they would receive it. I intended to offer as a substitute for this resolution a resolution embodying the principle of participation by the three agencies, the Senate, the House, and the governmental departments. That, then, could go by unanimous consent to the House, and I can not understand why the House would object to it when they have already gone on record by passing a similar resolution.

Mr. POMERENE. My question was not prompted by any spirit of opposition to the purpose of the resolution; in fact, I favor it very strongly, but I was not quite sure as to what the House had already done in that behalf. It occurred to me that if we knew it might aid us in coming to a conclusion as to what the Senate should do. I hope there will be some legislation on this subject at an early day.

Mr. KENYON. I came in during the discussion. I should like to inquire if there is a request for the immediate consideration of the resolution by the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. KNOX. Yes; I asked for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

Mr. KENYON. The matter will lead to some discussion, as indicated by the Senator from New Jersey. The Senator from New Jersey proposes to offer a substitute for the resolution. If he did not do so, I should certainly offer as a substitute my resolution. I think the matter had better go over. I do not make the request from any spirit of hostility, for I am for anything that will bring about a budget system.

Mr. KNOX. I appreciate the attitude of the Senator from Iowa, and as undoubtedly the resolution is likely to lead to discussion I will withdraw the request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I introduce a joint resolution relative to the subject just under discussion, and I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Rules. I should like to have the Committee on Rules consider it, and if a special committee has been constituted by the Committee on Rules for the consideration of this matter, I should like this resolution to be referred to that committee for consideration.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 50) creating a budget system, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Rules.

MISS ALICE WOOD—PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, as personal explanations have been very much in order in the Senate of late, I rise to a question of personal privilege and will make a short statement in connection with it.

I do not find that I am able at all times to be in attendance upon the Senate during all of the morning hour each day. The demands on my time are sometimes so great that I find that to be impossible. Last Friday I was not able to be in the Senate during the entire morning hour, and I learn from the RECORD of last Friday that during the morning hour of that day, and in my absence, the following resolution was reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and it is hereby, directed to investigate and ascertain the facts relative to the suspension by the board of education of the District of Columbia of Miss Alice Wood, a teacher in the schools of the District, and report the same to the Senate, with its recommendations; and the committee, or any subcommittee conducting such investigation, is authorized to subpœna witnesses, send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and take all steps necessary to ascertain the facts, and to employ such stenographic help as may be necessary, at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recess of the Senate in conducting such investigation.

That resolution was then, by unanimous consent, taken up for immediate consideration, and, by unanimous consent, was adopted.

I merely rise to say that if I had been here the resolution would not have been taken up for consideration or adopted by unanimous consent. I doubt not that by motion it would have been taken up for consideration, and that upon motion it would have been adopted, but it would not have been done by unanimous consent. I am not content to let the statement of unanimous consent on the part of the Senate remain in the RECORD without a statement from me that I am not in accord with it, and that, if I had been present, unanimous consent would not have been obtained.

The matter involved in the resolution is now in the courts of the District of Columbia, and I think it undignified and improper for the United States Senate to undertake an investigation of it, at least while it is pending in the courts. I have no doubt that all of the facts will come out during the proceedings in the courts, which are now pending.

It has been charged that Miss Wood undertook to give in the public schools of the District the other side of Bolshevism, meaning the attractive side, and I have never seen nor heard any denial of that charge. I have followed the matter pretty closely in the newspapers, and I have never heard of Miss Wood or anyone in her behalf denying that she undertook to give the pupils of her school the other side of Bolshevism, meaning the side that is not regarded favorably by the American people in general; in other words, the attractive side; that Bolshevism is not so bad as it is generally painted.

The school board of the District took cognizance of the matter and investigated it sufficiently to arrive at the conclusion that Miss Wood had done something wrong and that she should be disciplined. It arrived at a conclusion that was satisfactory to the school board, and Miss Wood was suspended for a week. I believe the school board was right in the matter.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I ask for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. MYERS. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to ask for the regular order. I notice that the Senator from Montana announced that he desired to speak on a question of personal privilege.

Mr. MYERS. I am; and I waited until all morning business had been transacted.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator think that the statement he is now making is a matter of personal privilege?

Mr. MYERS. Yes, sir; and I desire two or three minutes more to explain my attitude in the matter.

Mr. WARREN. I simply say that I ask for the regular order.

Mr. MYERS. As I have stated, I waited until I thought all of the morning business had been concluded; I purposely so waited, and I ask the privilege of completing my statement. It will take only a few moments. Of course, if not accorded the privilege, I shall sit down.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is not responsible for the call for the regular order. Are there further bills or joint resolutions? If not, concurrent and other resolutions are in order.

NATIONAL PEACE POLICY.

Mr. KNOX. I send to the desk a resolution, which I ask may be read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I wish to give notice that in the near future I shall address myself to the subject of the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 76) was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Whereas the Congress of the United States in declaring, pursuant to its exclusive authority under the Constitution, the existence of a state of war between the United States and the Imperial German Government, solemnly affirmed that the Imperial Government has so "committed repeated acts of war against the Government and the people of the United States" that a state of war had been thrust upon them by that Government, and thereupon formally pledged the whole military and national resources of the country "to bring the conflict to a successful termination"; and

Whereas the Senate of the United States, being a coequal part of the treaty-making power of this Government and therefore coequally responsible for any treaty which is concluded and ratified, is deeply concerned over the draft treaty of peace negotiated at Versailles by which it is proposed to end our victorious war, and is gravely impressed by the fact that its provisions appear calculated to force upon us undesirable and far-reaching covenants inimical to our free institutions under the penalty that failing to accept these we shall continue in a state of war, while our cobelligerents shall be at peace and enjoying its blessings; that it is proposed to make us parties to a league of nations under a plan as to which the people of the United States have had neither time to examine and consider nor opportunity to express regarding it a matured and deliberate judgment, whereas the treaty may be easily so drawn as to permit the making of immediate peace, leaving the question of the establishment of a league of nations for later determination; and that the treaty as drawn contains principles, guaranties, and undertakings obliterative of legitimate race and national aspirations, oppressive of weak nations and peoples, and destructive of human progress and liberty: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That it will regard as fully adequate for our national needs and as completely responsive to the duties and obligations we owe to our cobelligerents and to humanity a peace treaty which shall assure to the United States and its people the attainment of those ends for which we entered the war, and that it will look with disfavor upon all treaty provisions going beyond these ends.

2. That since the people of the United States have themselves determined and provided in their Constitution the only ways in which the Constitution may be amended, and since amendment by treaty stipulation is not one of the methods which the people have so prescribed, the treaty-making power of the United States has no authority to make a treaty which in effect amends the Constitution of the United States, and the Senate of the United States can not advise and consent to any treaty provision which would have such effect if enforced.

3. That the Senate advises, in accordance with its constitutional right and duty, that the great paramont, if not sole, duty of the peace conference is quickly to bring all the belligerents a full and complete peace; that to this end, the treaty shall be so drawn as to permit any nation to reserve without prejudice to itself for future separate and full consideration by its people the question of any league of nations; that neither such an article nor the exercise of the rights reserved thereunder, whether at the time of signature, the time of ratification, or at any other time, shall affect the substance of the obligations of Germany and its cobelligerents under the treaty nor the validity of signature and ratification on their behalf; and that any indispensable participation by the United States in matters covered by the league covenant shall, pending the entry of the United States into the league, be accomplished through diplomatic commissions, which shall be created with full power in the premises.

4. That this resolution indicates and gives notice of the limits of the present obligations against the United States in which the Senate of the United States is now prepared to acquiesce by consenting to the ratification of a treaty embodying peace conditions that may be found otherwise acceptable to its judgment, and that the adoption by the peace conference of the foregoing reasonable limitations and positions will facilitate the early acceptance of the treaty of peace by the Senate of the United States, will in no wise interfere with the league of nations as between these countries prepared to ratify the treaty without further consideration, and will afford such a manifestation of real respect for the wishes of a great people as can not fail more firmly to cement the friendship already existing between ourselves and our cobelligerents.

5. That, finally, it shall be the declared policy of our Government, in order to meet fully and fairly our obligations to ourselves and to the world, that the freedom and peace of Europe being again threatened by any power or combination of powers the United States will regard such a situation with grave concern as a menace to its own peace and freedom, will consult with other powers affected with a view to devising means for the removal of such menace, and will, the necessity arising in the future, carry out the same complete accord and cooperation with our chief cobelligerents for the defense of civilization.

WISCONSIN'S RATIFICATION OF WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I take great pleasure in sending to the Secretary's desk a message which I have just received, and I ask to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

MADISON, WIS., June 10, 1919.

Hon. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE,
Washington, D. C.:

Federal suffrage amendment ratified by both houses at 11.30 this morning.

EDWARD F. DITSMAR,
Lieutenant Governor.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR KEY PITTMAN.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] on June 5 made a very able address on the league of nations at the Academy of Political Science at Columbia University. I have read the address, and it is very fine, and contains a great deal of information. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. MOSES. Who is the author of it?

Mr. SWANSON. The senior Senator from Nevada. It is a discussion of the league of nations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. FLETCHER. I suggest that it be not printed in the RECORD but printed as a document.

Mr. SWANSON. It has been the custom to have addresses of Senators printed in the RECORD.

Mr. FLETCHER. Let it be printed in both forms.

Mr. SWANSON. I did not ask that it be printed as a public document.

Mr. FLETCHER. I simply suggest to the Senator that we would get more use out of it as a public document.

Mr. SWANSON. Only four or five hundred copies would be printed as a public document, and if it goes in the RECORD many thousands will be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

"Mr. Chairman, permit me to express my deep appreciation of the honor you have conferred upon me through your invitation to address this distinguished assemblage. I assure you that I have in mind the proprieties of the occasion and the necessity for brevity. It is such limitations that make the effort more difficult, and especially for one schooled in a body of unlimited and sometimes ungoverned debate.

"The distinguished chairman [Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler], in his statement to the effect that, while he hopes that the covenant of the league of nations will be adopted, he would have written a very much different instrument had he been intrusted with the responsibility, suggests to my mind a very pertinent thought. It is but natural that statesmen should differ not only with regard to the expression of an idea, but as to the plan and procedure involving any revolutionary undertaking. Such was the experience of the framers of our Constitution. Benjamin Franklin, near the close of our Constitutional Convention of 1787, read a statement expressing his views with regard to the adoption of the Constitution. He then said, in part:

"In these sentiments, sir, I agree to this Constitution, with all its faults, if they are such; because I think a general government necessary for us, and there is no form of government but what may be a blessing to the people if well administered; * * * I doubt, too, whether any other convention we can obtain may be able to make a better Constitution. For, when you assemble a number of men to have the advantage of their joint wisdom, you inevitably assemble with those men all their prejudices, their passions, their errors of opinion, their local interests, and their selfish views. From such an assembly can a perfect production be expected?

"This, undoubtedly, expresses the thoughts of many of the framers of the covenant of the league of nations and of the Members of the United States Senate who will be called upon to ratify the treaty that embraces the covenant.

"How much more difficult it must have been to bring about a unanimous agreement between the members of the peace conference composed of many different races, speaking different languages, raised in different environments, and trained in different schools of thought. Even in our own Congress, notwithstanding a grave demand and most serious effort to pass a law for the development of our mineral resources, we have, during a period of four years, found it impossible to draft a bill that would meet with the approval of a sufficient number of United States Senators to insure its enactment. It is remarkable that the peace conference was able to draft any covenant that could meet the unanimous approval of that peculiarly constituted body. There can be little doubt that the covenant in its present form is the most definite and reasonable agreement that can be reached.

"There are three kinds of leagues of nations that have been under consideration by statesmen throughout the world, and very probably by the peace conference. The plans of these leagues of nations differ chiefly in the power that may be exerted to compel compliance with their covenants. They may be designated as the conservative, the radical, and the compromise plans.

"The conservative plan carries with it no power of enforcement other than public sentiment. It means little more than the adoption of our present arbitration treaties by the peace conference. Under this plan, as under our present arbitration treaties, any nation may decline to abitrate without bringing upon it any punishment by other nations. Under the exceptions and reservations included in all such treaties, for instance, that a nation is not required to arbitrate matters affecting its 'honor' or its 'vital interests,' any nation may find an excuse to avoid the purpose of the treaty. In other words, the matter of arbitration is entirely optional with the contracting parties, and either party to the contract may withdraw under these broad exceptions and reservations. While these treaties have accomplished good and have been the means of settling many disputes of minor consequences, they have no binding effect upon any nation which seeks war and in these cases are not only useless but deceptive.

"The radical plan proposes the enforcement of the provisions of the covenant by armaments under the direct control of a league of nations. This plan was favored by many of the French statesmen and probably by the delegates of the French Republic at the peace conference. Under this plan a power would have been created which would have had many of the attributes of government and might have, with much reason, been characterized as a supergovernment.

"The compromise plan, while denying the right to the league to raise armies and control and direct armaments, except with unanimous consent of all of the Governments, does provide for the enforcement of the terms of the covenant through the combined moral, commercial, and economic forces of the Governments that are members of the league. The covenant adopted by the peace conference embodies and exemplifies the compromise plan.

"In view of the wide divergence of opinion, is it not wonderful that any compromise plan could have been agreed upon? And is it not dangerous to again open up the whole matter for discussion, reconsideration, and further action by a peace conference? At the time that the covenant of the league of nations was adopted the consciences of nations, chastened by the horrors of war, were ready to make concessions for peace, but as time goes on these sentiments may be supplanted by the ambitions of the victor.

"Any amendment by the United States Senate would result in a rejection of the treaty by us and compel the reopening of negotiations, unless the other nations involved should ignore the action of the United States and proceed to ratify the treaty in its present form. In that event we would be isolated from our present allies and forced to make a separate peace with our enemies. The so-called right of amendment of the treaty by the United States Senate is a misnomer. The sole authority of the Senate, under the Constitution, is to advise and consent to the adoption of the treaty.

"It may, of course, after rejecting the treaty by amendment, represent to the President of the United States and the other authorized negotiators of treaties that two-thirds of the Senate will approve a treaty in a certain form if entered into by the respective Governments. The act of the Senate in adopting amendments would, nevertheless, have the same effect as the direct rejection of the treaty. It must be apparent, not only to United States Senators but to all well-informed men and women who have given the matter consideration, that the other nations who have suffered more than we have through this war, and who have joined so sincerely with us in arriving at the present treaty, will hardly tolerate further delay by reason of hypocritical objections to matters which must have been most thoroughly and painfully worked out.

"There are, in my opinion, but two questions to be determined by each Senator in reaching a conclusion as to whether he will vote for the approval or the rejection of the treaty, namely, first, is the treaty fair and honorable and does it make for peace in the world; second, is it so injurious or dangerous to the vital interests of our country that, notwithstanding the good it may accomplish for peace, he is not justified in approving it?

"In discussing the potentialities of the covenant of the league of nations, I will devote my argument principally to its powers with relation to our own sovereignty and governmental policies. I presume that all statesmen agree that concerted action of nations is essential to world peace, and that such action must be supported by effective powers. Of course, I do not assume to commit partisan politicians or those political economists who believe, or argue, that the United States can be isolated from the rest of the world. This theory of national isolation is an ancient Chinese doctrine that has not brought to China the progress and prosperity that we seek for our country.

"The conditions existing in the early history of our Government might have given some foundation for an argument for national isolation. We did not then possess the power or influence to be a determining factor in international action and intercourse. We were then desperately using every energy of mind and body to firmly establish and maintain a democracy in the midst of world autocracy, and in the presence of the opposition of jealous and fearful rulers of other Governments and skeptical, timid, and disloyal residents within our own country.

"Revolutionary changes have taken place since those days. The products of our mines, our fields, and our factories have grown beyond the demands of our own people. Our progress and prosperity require that we compete in the markets of the world. We stand as the richest nation on earth. We have advanced and are advancing with greater strides than any other people. Since the World War commenced we have jumped from the position of fourth to that of second place in world shipping. Our citizens are carrying the freedom of their institutions, the energy of their industry, and the skill of their accomplishments to every country where any other free man is permitted to tread. It is our duty to encourage and protect our people in these great undertakings, and this can only be accomplished through the agreement and concerted action of all civilized nations. The covenant of the league of nations is such an agreement.

"The progress, the peace, and the happiness of every nation must inevitably be affected by the conditions existing in other nations. The time has arrived when the intercourse and affairs of nations have become so intimate and intricate, through the remarkable facilities for transportation and communication, that a far greater cooperation is imperative.

"We can not escape the effects of the vital actions of other nations. To the mind of the thoughtful man the recent World War has demonstrated this beyond argument. Who, five years ago, would have imagined that the assassination of an Austrian prince, by a lowly Serbian subject of Austria in a remote section of Europe, could involve our country and practically the whole world in the most disastrous war that has ever cursed humanity? Certainly there is no patriotic, intelligent citizen who believes or would argue that we could have avoided being dragged into this war. Then how can we hope to escape future foreign wars that may be nearer to our country? So, apparently being unable to isolate our Nation from the effects of foreign wars, it is our sacred duty to do everything in our power to eliminate war.

"This beneficent consummation has been sought by our statesmen for many years. They have earnestly attempted through treaties of arbitration to accomplish the determination of rights and the reparation for wrongs through instrumentalities of justice rather than by the force of arms. Numerous treaties have been entered into by us with various nations, and between other nations, providing for the arbitration of disputes that might lead to war. And yet, when this great war was threatened, civilized nations found themselves without authority under any of these treaties to interpose in behalf of the peace of the world. That must never happen again.

"Had the covenant of the league of nations been in force in July, 1914, Austria would not have declared war upon Serbia, and the most brutal, un-Christian, and disastrous catastrophe that the world has ever known would have been spared to humanity.

"Serbia, after making full reply to the Austrian ultimatum and after humbly apologizing and offering every honorable reparation, proposed that—

"In case the Austro-Hungarian Government should not consider itself satisfied with the answer, it is ready, as always, to accept a peaceful solution, either by referring the decision of the question to the international tribunal at The Hague or by leaving it to the great powers who cooperated in the preparation of the explanation given by the Serbian Government on the 17th–31st March, 1909.

"England, France, and Russia, in the interest of world peace, urged Austria to accept Serbia's proposal. Austria, spurred on by Germany, declined, and the rest of the world were powerless even to defer the impending disaster. This conclusively demonstrated the inefficacy in such cases of all of the efforts of the past and the inefficiency of the peace instrumentalities that had been provided.

"Under the provisions of articles 12 and 15 of the covenant of the league of nations Serbia would have proposed to submit the matter to arbitration or to inquiry by the council of the league of nations. Austria would have been compelled to submit either to arbitration under article 13 or an investigation, inquiry, and recommendation by the council or the assembly under article 15, and in any event to desist from 'war until three months after the award by the arbitrators or the report by the council.' Serbia would undoubtedly then have taken advantage of that part of article 15 which provides:

"That they—

"Which would include Austria—

"will not go to war with any party to the dispute which complies with the recommendations of the report.

"Serbia would have complied with any recommendation.

"A portion of the penalty provided in article 16 and which would have applied to Austria under article 17 is as follows:

"Should any member of the league resort to war in disregard of its covenants under articles 12, 13, or 15 it shall ipso facto be deemed to have committed an act of war against all other members of the league, which hereby undertakes immediately to subject it to the severance of all trade or financial relations, the prohibition of all intercourse between their nationals and the nationals of the covenant-breaking State and the prevention of all financial, commercial, or personal intercourse between the nationals of the covenant-breaking State and the nationals of any other State, whether a member of the league or not.

"It shall be the duty of the council in such case to recommend to the several Governments concerned what effective military or naval forces the members of the league shall severally contribute to the armaments of forces to be used to protect the covenants of the league.

"Does anyone doubt that in such circumstances Germany would have desisted from her instigations and Austria would have refrained from war?

"I have taken this concrete case, so fresh in our minds, for the purpose of illustrating my analysis of the potentiality of the covenant of the league of nations in the enforcement of peace. We can not conceive that a more difficult situation threatening the peace of the world could ever arise to test the efficiency of the league.

"The covenant of the league of nations chiefly depends for its effectiveness on that portion of article 16 which I have just quoted, and while there may be those who will scout the influence of the combined moral, commercial, and economic forces of nations, students of history recognize that it is rapidly becoming the dominant power for peace and justice on earth. No nation can stand in the face of the public condemnation and ostracism of the world.

"But the chief attacks made in the United States upon the covenant of the league of nations are not based upon its lack of power to prevent or defer war, but upon the alleged grant to the league of jurisdiction and power to interfere with the vital interests of our Government.

"What are the vital interests that we submit to the league of nations under the covenant? There is not contained in the document a single prohibition or limitation upon our right to defend our own territory or our citizens against attack. Our domestic affairs and our Monroe doctrine are expressly excluded from the jurisdiction of the league. It is granted no control over our Army or our Navy. It is granted no power to fix or determine our armaments, but only the authority to recommend a plan looking to the reduction of armaments in all nations. The adoption or rejection of any proposed plan would be exclusively within the authority of our Congress under the express terms of the covenant. It has no authority other than that expressly conferred upon it by the covenant. It is purely a creature and agent of the contracting Governments. Members of the league are only obligated to submit to arbitration, under article 13, 'disputes as to the interpretation of a treaty, as to any question of international law, as to the existence of any fact which if established would constitute a breach of international obligation, or as to the extent and nature of the reparation to be made for any such breach.' There are no other requirements in the covenant as to arbitration. Such action would only involve the adjudication of the terms of a contract or the measure of damages for a proven wrong. Our Government has long favored such arbitrations. It is committed to the policy. Beyond these questions there is no provision for compulsory arbitration. Have our people such passion for war that they would refuse to submit such disputes to arbitration when their continued existence threatened us with war and endangered the peace of the world?

"If disputes arise that are not subject to arbitration, then the matter shall be submitted under articles 12 and 15 to the league for inquiry, report, and recommendation. What, then, is the result and effect of such submission? If a report is adopted by a unanimous vote, then the recommendations are submitted to the disputants. If both accept, the matter, of course, is settled. If neither accepts the recommendation, then both are free to pursue their own course. If only one of the disputants accepts the recommendations, then the other is only bound to the extent that it shall not go to war.

"If our Nation in any case were adjudged to be in the wrong it would still have the privilege of breaking off all relations. It would still have the right to treat the opposing nation as unfriendly and visit upon it every power of isolation and ostracism that it could command. And let us keep in mind that this adjudication requires the unanimous vote of every member of the league except the representatives of the disputants. It is true that the matter may be referred to the assembly, but in this case it requires a unanimous vote of the assembly, which, of course, includes the members of the council.

"And, again, let it be distinctly remembered that incorporated in the provisions of this article 12, the effects of which I have been analyzing, we find this express exception of jurisdiction and limitation of authority. I quote:

"If the dispute between the parties is claimed by one of them and is found by the council to arise out of a matter which by international law is solely within the domestic jurisdiction of that party, the council shall so report and shall make no recommendation as to its settlement.

"This section was the subject of broad discussion and interpretation at the peace conference by those who will constitute the council and the assembly of the league of nations. The Japanese representatives contended that under the construction of such paragraph governments such as the United States, Canada, and Australia could continue to cast upon the Japanese race the alleged stigma of inequality by excluding them from their shores under their immigration laws. The peace conference recognized that the question of immigration is a domestic question, and it therefore refused to adopt the amendment offered by the Japanese representatives in attempting to change the paragraph in this effect.

"We only limit Japanese immigration through a gentleman's agreement with Japan, while Canada and Australia have long had upon their statute books stringent Japanese exclusion acts.

"The protection of our domestic jurisdiction is of vital importance to us. So is the protection of the domestic jurisdiction of Canada and Australia equally vital to those countries. It is but natural that every nation should be jealous of its domestic jurisdiction, and in this we find conclusive assurance against interference by the league with matters within the domestic jurisdiction of our own Nation. So the maximum restraint upon our sovereignty would be that, upon the unanimous verdict of the world, we would have to refrain from war.

"Should we desire to go to war against the unanimous verdict of the world?

"Could we hope to win a war against the unanimous disapproval of the world?

"Is this so dangerous a covenant that we should be willing to endure militarism rather than submit to it?

"Can we conceive of any plan for peaceful settlement of disputes that so little affects our sovereignty?

"If we, the leader of democracy, the most ardent advocate of peace, and the bitterest opponent of militarism, are unwilling to submit such international disputes, equally with all other civilized nations, to the unanimous verdict of the world, then, indeed, all is hopeless.

"Hardly had these smoke screens, under which pessimistic and hopeless statesmen of the order of national isolation and militarism attacked the covenant of peace, been cleared away by the unalterable construction of the peace conference before these same statesmen had shifted their attack to the effect of the covenant of the league upon our sacred Monroe doctrine. They contend that under article 10 of the covenant, which reads as follows—

"The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league—

"the league has usurped our authority to protect the Republics on the American continent to the south from external aggression against the territorial and existing political independence of those countries. They seem to fail to see—at least, they are unwilling to admit—that such declaration of article 10 is but a confirmation of our Monroe doctrine with regard to the Republics of the American continent extended and applied to all the nations of the earth. They, with all of the citizens of our country, should have rejoiced that the principles pronounced by President Monroe on behalf of this country as applying to South and Central America should have been recognized and approved by all of the civilized nations of the world.

"It was the national militaristic attitude of the world that forced our pronouncement of the Monroe doctrine. It was the knowledge that under the old order of things conquests by nations of other races and governments were deemed justifiable in aid of national expansion, glory, and power that made the Monroe doctrine imperative. The Monroe doctrine was the expression of a high principle and was essential to our protection against existing conditions, but it was a terrible burden that constantly grew more threatening. It was not recognized by other governments until the adoption of the covenant of the league of nations as an international principle or doctrine, and its authority was challenged on more than one occasion by powerful nations. It had no support in the world until reenunciated and adopted in the covenant of the league of nations, except the power of our own Government and the determination of our people to go to war in its defense. But that the suspicions and palsying fear of these statesmen might be forever allayed, in article 21 of the revised draft of the covenant it is expressly provided that—

"Nothing in this covenant shall be deemed to affect the validity of international engagements, such as treaties of arbitration or regional understandings like the Monroe doctrine for securing the maintenance of peace.

"The purpose in adding this provision in the revised covenant was that there might be no doubt as to the exclusion of the Monroe doctrine from the effect of the treaty. It is not subject to any other reasonable construction. Yet the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who is leading a solid Republican phalanx in the Senate against 'advising and consenting' to the treaty with the covenant of the league of nations therein, boldly proclaims that the validity of the Monroe doctrine is not recognized or protected by such provision. He says that the Monroe doctrine is not a 'regional understanding.' What difference does it make what the Monroe doctrine is when it is expressly excluded from the effect of the treaty by name? The peace conference has seen fit to decide that the Monroe doctrine is a regional understanding. If Alaska were excluded from the effect of the covenant, it would be immaterial whether it was designated as the 'District of Alaska' or the 'Territory of Alaska.' There might be a difference of opinion as to whether 'District' or 'Territory' better described the political character of Alaska, but there would still remain no doubt as to what was meant by 'Alaska.'

"And again they contend, with apparent seriousness and intensity of argument, that the words 'for securing the maintenance of peace' found at the end of article 21 will enable the league to pass upon whether or not the Monroe doctrine is for 'securing the maintenance of peace.' In other words, they are attempting to convince the people of the United States that, by reason of such words, the league has the jurisdiction and power to hold that the Monroe doctrine is not for the purpose of securing the maintenance of peace, and therefore is not excluded under article 21 from the effect of the treaty. It is apparent from a most casual reading of the article that the Monroe doctrine is set up as an example of the kind of regional understandings that will be excluded from the effect of the treaty. It says plainly and means that other regional understandings for securing the maintenance of peace 'like the Monroe doctrine' shall not be affected by the treaty. The article recognizes that the Monroe doctrine is for securing the maintenance of peace, and it not only expressly excludes the Monroe doctrine from the effect of the treaty but all other regional understandings like the Monroe doctrine. Let the American people read article 21, and I am satisfied that they will consider the arguments of these distinguished Senators as an insult to their intelligence and common sense. It exposes the character of argument to which these bitter opponents of the covenant in their desperation are driven and destroys their influence at home and abroad.

"While there are still some attacks being made with regard to these provisions, in a heated and demagogic manner, the opponents of broader statesmanship are attacking the covenant upon the fundamental theory that it creates a supergovernment and destroys our nationalism. In support of this contention they quote that portion of article 10, which provides—

"In case of any such aggression, or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression, the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

"And, again, they refer to that paragraph of article 4, which states—

"The council may deal at its meetings with any matter within the sphere of action of the league or affecting the peace of the world.

"The word 'deal' in this case must be synonymous with 'consider and recommend.' It grants no more authority than the 'power to advise' provided in article 10. There is no provision for the enforcement of this advice or their decision with regard to the matters with which they may deal. The only force provided in the entire covenant and agreed upon is the commercial, financial, and moral blockade provided in article 16. The only physical force considered in the covenant is set forth in article 17, as follows:

"It shall be the duty of the council in such case to recommend to the several governments concerned what effective military or naval forces the members of the league shall severally contribute to the armaments of forces to be used to protect the covenants of the league.

"It does not say recommend to the membership of the league, but 'recommend to the several governments.' In other words, it was intended, and its effect is, that it remains with the Congress of the United States to accept or reject any such recommendations. What, then, becomes of the bold, heated, and impassioned declamation of the opponents of the covenant when they ask the mothers of the country if they wish to place in the power of the league of nations the right to send their boys as soldiers to fight in the far corners of the earth? There is no provision in the covenant that can be tortured into such construction. There is no provision in the covenant that grants the league of nations any jurisdiction or control over our Army or our Navy or our soldiers. No vital act may be done by the league of nations without our vote, because it requires a unanimous vote, except as to matters of disputes in which we are involved, and I have shown that as to those matters no action may be taken that could vitally effect the interests of our Government.

"The supporters of the covenant of the league are ardent in their efforts for a great nationalism, and it is for such reason that they are striving so intensely to maintain the position and influence of the United States among the nations of the world. It would be unfortunate, indeed, if our nationalism were only supported by those few statesmen who arrogate to themselves the only Americanism.

"In my opinion, there can be no great nationalism isolated from internationalism. One of the great purposes of the covenant is the establishment and maintenance of nationalism. It is taking small, subservient races and making independent nations of them. It is making a nation of Poland. It is making a nation of Czechoslovakia. It is making a nation of Jugo-Slovenia. And their nationalism shall be sustained through the united action of the old and established nations of the earth under the covenant of the league of nations. And the adoption of these underlying and dominant principles will establish and maintain the national independence of every subservient race."

DAYLIGHT-SAVING LAW.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask permission to present a letter in the form of a resolution from the Farm Bureaus of Walsh County, N. Dak., respecting the daylight-saving law. I ask that it may be read. It is a brief letter, and I ask that Senators give attention to a suggestion for an amendment covering the large cities.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

COOPERATIVE EXTENSION WORK IN AGRICULTURE AND HOME ECONOMICS,
STATE OF NORTH DAKOTA,
Grafton, N. Dak., May 26, 1919.

Senator PORTER J. MCCUMBER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Farm Bureaus of Walsh County, N. Dak., ask you to use your influence toward amending or repealing the so-called daylight-saving law. Farmers here all agree the law places a handicap on them, especially in connection with hired help. In haying, harvest, and threshing the farmers are compelled to work on "old time."

Suggestions received at this office state that a law might be so framed that large cities could use the daylight-saving plan without affecting the whole Nation.

Thanking you for your service in this matter, we are,

Yours, very truly,

WALSH COUNTY FARM BUREAUS,
L. J. HERBISON,
President Eastern Bureau, Grafton, N. Dak.
E. M. RUZICKA,
President Western Bureau, Fordville, N. Dak.

Mr. McCUMBER. I also ask to have inserted in the RECORD a letter from the editor and manager of the Dakota Farmer on the same subject, explaining more in detail the matter which has just been read.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ABERDEEN, S. DAK., June 5, 1919.

Hon. PORTER J. MCCUMBER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Re daylight saving.

DEAR SIR: After a careful study of the matter I am convinced that the so-called "daylight saving" works greatly to the disadvantage of farmers in "The Dakota Farmer Empire."

I fully realize the great advantages of "daylight saving" to city people and even to many in small towns, and until I had made a careful study of the proposition among farmers I was inclined to believe that their complaints in this connection were not justified, but I have changed my mind.

First, I wish to make it plain that the unsatisfactory labor situation has a great deal of bearing in this connection.

Right now we have here in our territory an illustration of how the present method is working to the disadvantage of our farmers. Labor is very scarce on the farms, and the great majority of the men working on farms insist on quitting on the new time, regardless of when they begin work. As it is generally impossible to begin work in haying, etc., until 8 or 9 o'clock in the morning, when there is any moisture on the grass, this makes a very short day, and apparently is going to have its effect in the amount of hay produced in this section this year.

Farmers who produce milk, cream, etc., for town or city market can not go by the "old time," as has been stated by many who oppose the farmer's opposition to the new time, because they must get their produce to market according to the time in vogue in the town or cities.

There are many other minor reasons, which I will not discuss at this time. On the whole, it appears to me that the farmers generally are being seriously handicapped by "daylight saving," and particularly so in this section, where we are considerably ahead of sun time on account of being so far west of the point where the time changes.

I believe this is a matter worthy of your most serious consideration, and if the matter of the repeal of the present law is brought before Congress I hope it may have your support.

Very truly, yours,

THE DAKOTA FARMER,
W. C. ALLEN,
Editor and Manager.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I give notice that on to-morrow at the conclusion of the routine morning business I shall address the body on the covenant for a league of nations and the Constitution.

THIRD DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the House bill 3478, being the general deficiency appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 3478) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS—SPEECH BY EX-PRESIDENT TAFT.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, during the morning hour, when we were presenting petitions and resolutions, and during that period when it is customary to present for printing in the RECORD speeches of prominent men whom the Senate may consider worthy of such an honor, I presented a short address made by ex-President Taft, delivered on the 7th of this month, dealing with the league of nations, and requested that it be published in the RECORD. To that objection was made by the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. At that time he asked that it be referred to the Committee on Printing. I then withdrew my request and the speech, and announced that I was unwilling for the speech of an ex-President to be swamped in the Committee on Printing, and that I would be forced to read it to the Senate.

I think that this speech is very timely, in view of the resolution which has been introduced this morning by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. I may say that it is the first time that I have ever known of an objection being made to the publication in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of a speech delivered by an ex-President of the United States. I am satisfied that, no matter what view he may express in regard to the covenant of the league of nations, his ability is recognized and that his sincerity is unquestioned. His address will certainly throw more light on this subject than is being shed upon it by a great many speeches that have been published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD without objection upon possibly another side of the question. I therefore am compelled to read from the New York Times of Sunday, June 8, the following:

TAFT CRITICIZES FOES OF LEAGUE—WARNS REPUBLICAN SENATORS OPPOSING COVENANT OF RESPONSIBILITY OF BLOCKING PEACE—DEFENDS WILSON'S COURSE—LEAGUE IS NOT HIS FAD, AND HE IS NOT TO BLAME FOR DELAY OF TREATY—FINISHES SPEAKING TOUR—STATE LEAGUE TO ENFORCE PEACE URGES EMPIRE STATE SENATORS TO SUPPORT COVENANT.

ALBANY, N. Y., June 7.

The 800 delegates attending the State convention of the League to Enforce Peace to-night listened to an address by William Howard Taft, ex-President of the United States and president of the league, and unanimously adopted a resolution ratifying the league of nations covenant and urging the State's representatives in the Senate, JAMES W. WADSWORTH, Jr., and WILLIAM M. CALDER, to support it. The resolution read:

"We, citizens of the State of New York, assembled in open convention in the city of Albany this 7th day of June, 1919, to consider the covenant of the league of nations, believing that the adoption of this covenant in its present form will provide the machinery for composing differences between nations, will promote and firmly establish world order, will make effective the enforcement of the treaty of peace, and will accomplish all this without involving our Nation in any obligations that we should not be ready to assume to lessen the danger of war, hereby

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this convention that we approve and indorse the covenant of the league of nations as proposed and urge that the Senate of the United States promptly ratify it; it is further

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the Hon. JAMES W. WADSWORTH and the Hon. WILLIAM M. CALDER and to the Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE, chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, United States Senate."

The convention marked the closing of a campaign instituted on May 31, during which Mr. Taft and others who indorse the league of nations covenant have addressed State conventions in 15 States. The big auditorium of Chancellor's Hall in the State Education Building was filled, and many stood throughout the meeting. While speaking, Mr. Taft was frequently cheered.

WARNS BUSINESS COMMUNITY.

In opening his address, Mr. Taft called attention to the fact that "if any substantial amendment is to be made to the treaty submitted by the President, it must go back to the other powers who signed it for their acceptance and approval."

"Upon those who insist that substantial amendments must be made to the treaty," he went on, "will therefore fall the responsibility for the indefinite postponement of peace, which the unconditional ratification of the treaty will at once bring about. It has been proposed to separate the covenant from the treaty and to ratify the treaty thus truncated or dissected, with the idea that peace will follow such action by the Senate.

"The suggestion has been made that peace thus might be reached through a protocol embodying the treaty and leaving the question of the league to further consideration. It should be premised that no one can initiate peace except the President of the United States, who is vested by the Constitution with this power. No one can make a protocol of peace except the President. If, therefore, the President deem it essential that the Senate should act upon the treaty as he submits it, there can be no protocol as long as he maintains that attitude, nor indeed could the protocol be concluded without the consent of Germany.

"In other words, all these propositions are nothing but conditional ratification on the basis of radical amendments, and they all will postpone indefinitely the coming of peace. Meantime the other great powers, under the terms of the treaty as they are now reported, can ratify the treaty and establish peace with Germany so far as they are concerned. In this way the anomalous condition will be presented of a state of war between Germany and ourselves while peace prevails between Germany and Great Britain, Germany and France, Germany and Italy, and Germany and Japan. This obviously disadvantageous condition for our industries and this delay in the resumption of our trade with Germany should make the business community of the United States scrutinize with care the reasons for substantially amending the covenant or attempting to dissect it out of the treaty."

FOUR GREAT STEPS FORWARD.

Mr. Taft said the creation of the league of nations would mark "four great steps of progress," which he enumerated as follows:

Limitation of armament.

The provision by which members of the league undertake to respect and preserve territorial integrity and political independence of all its members.

The clauses in which provision is made for the settlement of differences between members of the league by arbitration or mediation and a covenant of the nations not to begin war until machinery for settling differences peacefully shall have been tried.

Open diplomacy.

The ex-President answered criticisms of the league covenant in detail. Speaking of the criticism of the clause for the limitation of armaments, he said:

"What is the objection? It is that if we limit our armament we paralyze our Government in its defense of our liberties and our institutions against external aggression, and we expose ourselves naked to our enemies. The objection is entirely without weight. We limit our armament in consideration of the nations of the league limiting theirs. Our limit is adjusted proportionately to theirs, having due regard to the more or less exposed position of each nation, its obligations to the league, and its need for domestic use of armament."

Article 10, "the second great step forward," which provides for mutual preservation of territorial integrity and political independence, he called "the heart of the league."

"It is said," he went on, "that this will involve the United States in wars to protect nations in distant parts of the world in whose welfare we have no interest, and will call for an expenditure of money and the lives of our boys in which we ought not to involve our country. This is not true. The effect of the organization of the league, with the threat against any nation who should violate article 10 and attempt a war of conquest against another nation, will be to restrain that nation and prevent its beginning war."

The third great step forward Mr. Taft found in article 12, providing for mediation and arbitration.

"The same objections," he said, "are made to this step as to that of article 10, that it will involve us in trouble with remote nations, and possibly wars. There is the same answer, namely, that the knowledge of this union of the nations to enforce this obligation of the league will prevent its violation by reckless members."

Open diplomacy, the fourth great step, he said, would mean that the cards were to be "played face up on the table."

Summing up the objections made to the league, he said:

"There is no transfer of sovereignty under this league to the council of the assembly. The council only recommends and proposes and advises. It does not command or direct or order. The chief attacks upon the league rest entirely on the claim that the word 'recommend' means to 'command,' and that the word 'advise' means to 'direct,' and that the word 'propose' means to 'order.' This is an utterly unwarranted and strained construction of the league which every fair-minded man should see.

"The Monroe doctrine is specifically recognized by all nations as a regional understanding in the constitution of the league by a provision that nothing in the league shall affect it. This is the first time in the history of the doctrine that the Monroe doctrine has been recognized by the world as a customary convention. It is a great achievement for us."

PARTISANSHIP OUT OF PLACE.

"This is not a partisan question," said Mr. Taft in conclusion. "We should be for or against the league without respect to whether we are Democrats or Republicans. We should be for or against the league without regard to whether we think it will bring credit to our party or credit to any man. Personal and partisan considerations of this kind are reasons which should have no influence with us in determining an issue so fateful in the world's history and so likely to affect the future welfare of the people of the United States and of all mankind.

"When, therefore, you come to consider the question whether you are in favor of the treaty or not, you should search your hearts and souls and your consciences to see whether you are approaching it in the proper patriotic and humane spirit or whether you are against it because Mr. Wilson is for it and you may fear that he will gain credit for its adoption, or because you may suppose that his party may gain party credit for it. These are small reasons for supporting or opposing the league.

"The question is, Will it do good for this country or mankind? If it will, let us favor it. If it endangers our country or interferes with mankind, let's oppose it, but let's base our action and our view on high and patriotic reasons. When we approach the question of the league of nations from that standpoint, I do not doubt that the great majority of the people of the United States, and the needed majority of the Senators of the United States, will approve this league."

The convention was presided over by William Church Osborn. Other speakers included Herbert H. Houston, Rabbi Stephen S. Wise, of New York, and Miss Helen Varick Boswell, president of the Women's Republican Association. In his address Mr. Houston, who is publisher of the World's Work, referred to the recent bomb outrages, and declared that effective means of combating anarchism was to be found in the league of nations.

ARRAIGNS PARTISAN REPUBLICANS.

Mr. Taft reached Albany early to-day and at noon attended a luncheon given by the chamber of commerce. Mr. Taft spoke briefly at the luncheon, saying in part:

"This covenant is not a mere fad of Mr. Wilson. It is demanded by the peoples of France, Great Britain, and Italy. Neither Lloyd-George nor Clemenceau originally advocated it. They were driven to it by two things—one that their constituents demanded it, the other that the treaty of peace, which the terms of the armistice foreshadowed, could not be enforced without it.

"The opponents of the league, however, have aroused protest against the league among business men and partisan Republicans by asserting that Mr. Wilson is seeking personal credit and party advantage in making a league of nations and is sacrificing the interests of this country and delaying peace and prosperity to secure the league. The reasons for delay are now demonstrated to have been acute differences in respect to the terms of peace and not the covenant of the league, which was agreed to long before the treaty.

"Germany is now protesting against signing. When she does sign, as she must, and the President lays before the Senate the treaty, with the league as part of its web and woof, the business men and short-sighted Republicans who have based their opposition on personal or partisan reasons will have a rude awakening. They will find then that the responsibility for further delay of peace and the waiting prosperity will be not on Mr. Wilson, but on those in the Senate, who would amend the treaty by eliminating the league or materially changing its provisions.

"Such amendments would require the President to send back the made-over treaty to Paris for another conference to see whether all the signatories, including Germany, will consent to the new document framed by the Senate. I need hardly point out that this would consume months, during which business would wait, and numbing uncertainty would prevail. Meantime, France, Great Britain, and Italy, who will promptly ratify the treaty, will, under its terms as reported, at once resume or establish normal business with Germany, while for months we shall be embarrassed by the same restrictions in our commerce with her which the continued armistice would impose."

Mayor James R. Watt welcomed the representatives of the league. Gov. Alfred E. Smith and John H. Walker spoke briefly.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, just a word in regard to the reference that I requested be made of the speech of ex-President Taft.

Notice has been given to the Senate that all such speeches other than the speeches of Senators or documents from the legislative bodies of States shall be requested to go to the Committee on Printing; and I am going to follow out that policy, which was adopted by the Printing Committee, until the Senate overrules me. I have no feeling at all in the matter, and it would not have made any difference to me who made the speech that the Senator from Nevada asked to have printed in the RECORD. I would have objected just the same.

THIRD DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3478) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that it may be read for amendment, the amendments of the committee to be first considered.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator state that it will be read textually at some period before he asks for its passage?

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator wishes it read beforehand, of course that will be done.

Mr. KING. As I understand, the purpose of the Senator is to dispense with the reading at all and merely take up the amendments for consideration.

Mr. WARREN. Oh, no; it will all be read.

Mr. KING. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the request of the Senator from Wyoming? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill, and read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums are appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, namely:

ALIEN PROPERTY CUSTODIAN.

For expenses of the Alien Property Custodian authorized by the act entitled "An act to define, regulate, and punish trading with the enemy, and for other purposes," approved October 6, 1917, including personal and other services and expenses incident to the acquiring and rental of quarters in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, per diem allowances in lieu of subsistence not exceeding $4, traveling expenses, printing and binding, law books, books of reference and periodicals, supplies and equipment, and maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles, $90,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, as I recall the appropriation made for this bureau for the year past it was very liberal. I want to ask the chairman of the committee whether or not the expenditure of $90,000 seems to be legitimate and proper, in view of the very large appropriation, as I recall, which was made for this department. I can not conceive of any reason why the bureau should transcend the limits fixed by Congress and expend this large sum.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that this appropriation was considered exceedingly necessary by the committee in the consideration of it. That institution, as with other war measures, and those created because of the war, has grown beyond the comprehension of the Committee on Appropriations and of the Senate itself, and this is a genuine deficiency to bring us up to the first of the year.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit another inquiry? Is there no limitation whatever upon the discretion of executive officers as to deficiencies which they may create?

Mr. WARREN. We have from time to time in the past included in appropriation bills paragraphs covering that so far as we could; but we must provide—or, at least, it has always been considered that we must—that when the head of a department, a member of the President's Cabinet, certifies that a certain amount must be used in order to meet needed unexpected occurrences and others, it is legitimate for those amounts to be expended, and to take them up here in Congress as deficiencies. Of course, the Congress can allow such amounts or not, as it may deem proper, but a disallowance means to take away that which belongs to the servants of the Government and others who have earned the money for services or furnished commodities for which they should be paid.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think that the policy of permitting departments and bureaus and public officials to expend thousands of dollars, and even hundreds of thousands of dollars, and in the aggregate millions of dollars, each year as a deficit, when they know the limitations placed upon them, is a dangerous one?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I think no one knows it better, and no one is more opposed to it, and no one is more ready at all times to overcome it.

I have before me one of the paragraphs which I have just mentioned. It reads in this way:

No executive department or other Government establishment of the United States shall expend in any one fiscal year any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year, or involve the Government in any contract or other obligation for the future payment of money in excess of such appropriations, unless such contract or obligation is authorized by law. Nor shall any department or any officer of the Government accept voluntary service for the Government or employ personal service in excess of that authorized by law, except in cases of sudden emergency involving the loss of human life or the destruction of property.

Other paragraphs follow, for instance, this paragraph:

All appropriations made for contingent expenses or other general purposes, except appropriations made in fulfillment of contract obligations expressly authorized by law, or for objects required or authorized by law, without reference to the amounts annually appropriated therefor, shall, on or before the beginning of each fiscal year, be so apportioned by monthly or other allotments as to prevent expenditures in one portion of the year which may necessitate deficiency or additional appropriations to complete the service of the fiscal year for which said appropriations are made.

But, Mr. President, there never yet has been a Congress, and I presume there never will be, when some matters were not brought in to close some account that was found deficient. Perhaps Congress had not appropriated sufficiently for it. There will continue to be emergencies and there will continue to be amounts brought in for deficiencies. Of course, we have gone away beyond the bounds of anything in the past during the period of preparation for war and now in the closing of the war. All I can say about that is that I hope the Senate will be ready at all times to join us in such legislation as may put a stop to these deficiencies in the future.

Mr. KING. The Senator will admit that many of these appropriations—and I have very hastily examined the bill—exceed the authorization which would be permitted under the statute to which the Senator has just invited attention. The Senator knows that in many of the States, notwithstanding very stringent limitations, it became necessary, because of the constant deficits which were created, to pass penal statutes making it an offense for any public official to expend one dollar in excess of the appropriation made by the State or the municipal government. It seems to me that if these expenditures are continued in violation of the law it may be necessary to enact a very drastic penal statute to prohibit creating these excessive expenditures.

Mr. FLETCHER. I would suggest that while perhaps the expenditures have exceeded the appropriations, they have not exceeded the authorization to make contracts. When the law authorized the making of contracts by the various departments, even though the appropriations were not exceeded, there would still be the requirement that those contracts be met.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it is the universal custom of all the departments, and has been, to spend more money than has been appropriated, and it will never be stopped so long as we pass deficiency bills covering every dollar that they spend over and above the amount which was authorized. I have been here now nearly 17 years, and every year it has been the same identical thing, only it is growing every year more and more; and the younger the bureau or department the greater the expenses which are incurred over and above those which are authorized by law. The way to stop it is for Congress at some time to have backbone enough to say not one dollar of deficiency will be appropriated, and then the heads of the departments and the different bureau chiefs will begin to believe that we mean what we say.

There is not a year passes that this question is not discussed here upon the floor, and we say what we think ought to be done, but we never do it. I think the time has about arrived now when we should say to every department, "Do not spend one dollar more than is authorized by law," and when that time comes there will be hundreds of millions of dollars saved to the taxpayers of the country every year.

Mr. KING. If my colleagues will permit, I give notice now that I shall introduce as an amendment to one of the appropriation bills or some appropriate bill in the near future a provision that will make it a penal offense for departments or bureaus to expend more than has been appropriated for their purposes, and I shall do it within a very few days.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am delighted with this colloquy, because it leads up to what is so much needed, a budget system. Senators can declaim against this practice until they are out of breath, but they will never stop it, because the needs which are largely local and which are therefore represented locally by Senators and Representatives will overcome all the good resolutions on earth just as they have in the past. But with a decent, intelligent budget system, some restriction can be placed upon these expendiures.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I think I am in hearty accord with what has been said. I realize that this abuse has been growing. At the same time I can understand why there was really more necessity for it during the period of the war than perhaps at any other time. I suggest that an amendment similar to that suggested by the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] be prepared and made a part of this bill.

Mr. KING. If the Senator from Wyoming will agree not to press the bill to final passage before the end of the day I shall endeavor to prepare one.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Alien Property Custodian," on page 2, after line 12, to insert:

That section 9 of the "Act to define, regulate, and punish trading with the enemy, and for other purposes," approved October 6, 1917, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 9. That any person not an enemy or ally of enemy claiming any interest, right, or title in any money or other property which may have been conveyed, transferred, assigned, delivered, or paid to the Alien

Property Custodian hereunder and held by him or by the Treasurer of the United States, or to whom any debt may be owing from an enemy or ally of enemy whose property or any part thereof shall have been conveyed, transferred, assigned, delivered, or paid to the Alien Property Custodian hereunder, and held by him or by the Treasurer of the United States, may file with the said custodian a notice of his claim under oath and in such form and containing such particulars as the said custodian shall require; and the President, if application is made therefor by the claimant, may order the payment, conveyance, transfer, assignment, or delivery to said claimant of the money or other property so held by the Alien Property Custodian or by the Treasurer of the United States or of the interest therein to which the President shall determine said claimant is entitled: Provided, That no such order by the President shall bar any person from the prosecution of any suit at law or in equity against the claimant to establish any right, title, or interest which he may have in such money or other property. If the President shall not so order within 60 days after the filing of such application or if the claimant shall have filed the notice as above required and shall have made no application to the President, said claimant may, at any time before the expiration of six months after the end of the war institute a suit in equity in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia or in the district court of the United States for the district in which such claimant resides, or, if a corporation, where it has its principal place of business (to which suit the Alien Property Custodian or the Treasurer of the United States, as the case may be, shall be made a party defendant), to establish the interest, right, title, or debt so claimed, and if suit shall be so instituted then the money or other property of the enemy or ally of enemy, against whom such interest, right, or title is asserted, or debt claimed, shall be retained in the custody of the Alien Property Custodian, or in the Treasury of the United States, as provided in this act, and until any final judgment or decree which shall be entered in favor of the claimant shall be fully satisfied by payment or conveyance, transfer, assignment, or delivery by the defendant or by the Alien Property Custodian or Treasurer of the United States on order of the court, or until final judgment or decree shall be entered against the claimant, or suit otherwise terminated: Provided, however, That in respect of all property heretofore determined by the President to have been held for, by, on account of, or on behalf of, or for the benefit of a person who was an enemy or ally of enemy, if the President, after further investigation, shall determine that such person was an enemy or ally of enemy solely by reason of residence in that portion of the territory of any nation associated with the United States in the prosecution of the war which was occupied by the military or naval forces of Germany or Austria-Hungary, or their allies, and that such person is a citizen or subject of such associated nation, then the President, without any application being made therefor, may order the payment, conveyance, transfer, assignment, or delivery of such money or other property held by the Alien Property Custodian, or by the Treasurer of the United States, or of the interest therein to which the President shall determine such person entitled, either to the said enemy or to the person by whom said property was conveyed, transferred, assigned, delivered, or paid over to the Alien Property Custodian. And the receipt of the said enemy or of the person by whom said property was conveyed, transferred, assigned, or delivered to the Alien Property Custodian, shall be a full acquittance and discharge of the Alien Property Custodian or the Treasurer of the United States as the case may be, and of the United States in respect of all claims of all persons heretofore or hereafter claiming any right, title, or interest in said property, or compensation or damages arising from the capture of such property by the President or the Alien Property Custodian: Provided further, however, That except as herein provided no such action by the President shall bar any person from the prosecution of any suit at law or in equity to establish any right, title, or interest which he may have therein.

"Except as herein provided, the money or other property conveyed, transferred, assigned, delivered, or paid to the Alien Property Custodian shall not be liable to lien, attachment, garnishment, trustee process, or execution, or subject to any order or decree of any court.

"This section shall not apply, however, to money paid to the Alien Property Custodian under section 10 hereof."

Mr. WARREN. The period should be stricken out and a semicolon inserted after the word "Custodian," in line 15, page 5.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That change will be made.

Mr. KING. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee having this bill in charge what was the reason for placing in the general deficiency bill this legislation with respect to the Alien Property Custodian?

Mr. WARREN. The amendment appears to contain more than is actually asked for or granted by it. It reenacts a great deal of the old legislation. I shall ask the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to explain it, as he has taken particular care of the subject.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Most of this legislation is proposed to be reenacted; it is in the law already. It is just reenacting the section as a part of an appropriation bill, but the vital legislation in reference to the Alien Property Custodian act was passed in this way in this sort of a bill, and that is probably the excuse for bringing it back here for reenactment.

If the Senator will turn to page 3, line 20, I will state that the only change made there is that this language is inserted:

In the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia or.

That is one amendment. The reason for that amendment is that as the law now stands the claimants of this property are many of them persons whose property was taken through mistake and who are American citizens or allied citizens. In most cases the jurisdiction over the claimants is in the city of New York, in the southern district of New York. It was represented to us that that district was very crowded and very far behind in its dockets. This gives the option to the claimant or litigant to sue in the court in his own district, as provided in the act, or to come here and sue in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. If he comes here—and he can not be forced to come here; he comes of his own will—it gives him an earlier and speedier hearing and it is more convenient to the Government officers.

Mr. POMERENE. It has been said the dockets here in the District of Columbia are so overcrowded that they need two additional judges. Has the Senator any information on that subject?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not know about that, but it was represented to us that it would probably take many of these cases two or three years to get a hearing in New York, and that they would probably get a very much speedier hearing if this option were given. But it does not take anything away from anybody. It gives them the option, and it would be more convenient to the Government if they exercised their option.

The next amendment of the section, and the only other amendment, starts in line 13 on page 4, after the word "provided," and continues on down to the end of that page and to and including all of line 6 on page 5, except the words "and the receipt" on that line. That is practically half a page of an amendment. I will not take the time of the Senate to read it, but I will explain in a very few words what it is.

When the original bill was written, it made an alien enemy of a man who resided in alien territory. He did not necessarily have to be a German or an Austrian, or in arms against us, but any citizen of the United States, or any alien citizen who happened to be residing in Germany or those portions of Belgium and France that were occupied by the German Army, became an alien enemy for the purposes of the act. In other words, it gave the Alien Property Custodian power to take possession of his property and hold it, the purpose being to keep the property or the proceeds of the property or the income from the property from going back into enemy territory.

In other words, in the early days of the war it was found that certain large dividends that belonged either to Germans, on the one hand, or to American or French citizens who happened to be in alien territory, were finding their way through neutral countries into the hands of an American citizen in that alien country and possibly were confiscated. At any rate, we did not know what became of it, or whether it would be of value to the enemy, or whether it would be levied on there. The purpose of the act was to stop it, even if it was property belonging to a loyal American citizen, as long as it went to those sources. A noted case was that of Mr. Busch, whose property was taken over entirely. We found that in the enactment of the law this property could be turned back. It gave the right under section 9 to sue to get the property back if they had taken property from an American citizen or made a mistake in taking it; but it also provided that it could be turned back to the proper person with the consent to the enemy. The enemy in that case was not necessarily an enemy of the Government. In the sense of the law, the loyal American citizen residing in Germany or Belgium when his property was taken under the law, became an enemy so far as the act was concerned; and the purpose of this amendment is merely to give the Alien Property Custodian or the President, for whom the Alien Property Custodian is acting, an opportunity, where he finds he has taken property from a citizen of the United States or France or Belgium, to preserve it and keep it or its income out of the hands of the enemy and turn it back to its rightful owner without litigation.

In some cases he can not get consent of the enemy, as described here. For instance, some of this property was on its way, when the act was passed, through the banks of New York, and their correspondent was the Deutscher Bank or some other bank of Germany, and when it was levied on in the New York bank by the Alien Property Custodian, it was levied on in the name of the Deutscher Bank, and there it stands, and he can not get the consent of the Deutscher Bank to turn it back to the loyal subject who happened to be in that enemy territory. The main object is to facilitate settlements in the case of property that belongs to loyal people, either our own citizens or our Allies, without any litigation and without dispute. So the amendment amounts to but very little, although the language of the clause is long. The object is to save lawsuits and save costs and rapidly dispose of the matter.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, after line 17, to insert:

BUREAU OF EFFICIENCY.

For investigating duplication of statistical and other work in the various branches of the Government service, and for maintaining a current index record of such work and disseminating information concerning it to such Government organizations as may be concerned: Provided, That not later than June 30, 1919, all books, records, and papers relating to the investigations of duplication of statistical and other work and to the work of the statistical clearing house of the Central Bureau of Planning and Statistics shall be transferred to the Bureau of Efficiency, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Civil Service Commission," on page 8, line 1, before the word "who," to insert "sailors and marines," and in the same line, after the word "qualified," to strike out "if they" and insert "but whose wives," so as to make the clause read:

The unexpended balances on June 30, 1919, of appropriations for additional and temporary employees for the Civil Service Commission made, respectively, in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1919, and the "First deficiency appropriation act, 1919," are reappropriated and made available under the same conditions for the fiscal year 1920: Provided, That the act entitled an "An act to provide for the Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses," approved March 3, 1919, so far as it relates to preference in employment of honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines, be amended to read as follows: "That hereafter in making appointments to clerical and other positions in the executive branch of the Government in the District of Columbia or elsewhere preference shall be given to honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines, and widows of such, and to the wives of injured soldiers, sailors, and marines who themselves are not qualified but whose wives are qualified to hold such positions."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, after line 2, to insert:

EXECUTIVE.

Office of the President: For additional compensation to one expert stenographer, fiscal year 1920, $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued, the last item read being as follows:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

SALARIES.

Coroner's office: For payment of the deputy coroner during the absence of the coroner, $110.

Mr. KING. I move to strike out the item found on page 8, lines 21 and 22, being the item just read by the Secretary. As I understand, the coroner and the deputy coroner are provided for by existing law and their salaries are fixed. This seems to be an additional compensation by reason of the absence of one of the employees of the District of Columbia.

Mr. WARREN. I understand from one of the representatives of the District government that that is entirely under the legislation which has been passed heretofore; that in the necessary absence of the principal, the deputy has the amount of salary which he may earn during that time.

Mr. KING. I ask the Senator from Wyoming is that amount subtracted from the compensation provided by law for the principal?

Mr. WARREN. I have here what was stated on that question, which is as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Commissioner, the first estimate is for $95 for the deputy coroner. I understand you have increased that to $110.
Mr. BROWNLOW. Yes, sir; there is a supplemental estimate for $110, which makes the total required $205.
The CHAIRMAN. This is to pay the salary of the deputy during the absence of the coroner?
Mr. BROWNLOW. Yes; in accordance with the provisions of the code.
The CHAIRMAN. This is an actual deficiency?
Mr. BROWNLOW. Yes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, that does not explain the matter. It is clear that there is no diminution of the amount provided for the principal who absents himself.

Mr. WARREN. I do not understand that the code provides for that. I assume that the duties of the coroner are such that he can not always be present where a coroner is needed, and therefore the necessity of a deputy.

Mr. KING. I understand the law already gives vacations and annual leaves, and that during those periods the officer receives a fixed compensation; and, in addition to that, we are paying him the amount indicated in this item. I think it ought to go out, because it is double compensation.

I will say to the Senator that if he will consent that it may go out, if in conference it becomes apparent that there is a diminution or subtraction of the amount which the coroner obtains, I shall have no objection to it being inserted. I insist on my motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed, the last clause read being as follows:

For maintenance, care, and repair of automobiles, motor cycles, and motor trucks owned by the District of Columbia, that are not otherwise provided for, including such personal services in connection therewith not otherwise authorized, as the commissioners shall in writing specially order, $4,000.

Mr. KING. I move to strike out the paragraph commencing on line 6 and ending on line 11, on page 9.

Mr. JONES of Washington. What is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KING. I move to strike out lines 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11, on page 9. It has become the fad now for everybody who is an employee of this municipality and of the War Department—particularly the latter—to have automobiles and transportation furnished them to take them to and from their residences, their boarding houses, and their other places of abode. This seems to be largely for the purpose of furnishing automobiles, motorcycles, and so on, for employees of the District of Columbia. I doubt not that there has been a very liberal appropriation made heretofore for these particular matters.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I should like to make a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington will state it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Are we considering this appropriation bill under the usual consent that committee amendments are to be first considered?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The committee amendments are first to be considered, but nobody has raised the question.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to raise that question, because I think if we have that understanding it ought to be followed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then the Senator from Utah will have to defer his motion to strike out.

Mr. KING. I did not understand that the usual rule prevailed in this instance.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was under the subhead "Contingent and miscellaneous expenses," on page 9, after line 11, to strike out:

The appropriation for the establishment of an ice or cold storage plant at the morgue, contained in the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1918, is reappropriated and made available for the fiscal year 1920, together with the further sum of $3,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Public schools," on page 13, after line 18, to insert:

Longevity pay: For longevity pay for director of intermediate instruction, supervising principals, supervisor and assistant supervisor of manual training, principals of normal high and manual-training high schools, the assistant principal (who shall be dean of girls) of the Central High School, principals of grade manual-training schools, heads of departments, director and assistant director of primary instruction, directors and assistant directors of drawing, physical culture, music, domestic science, domestic art, kindergartens, and penmanship, teachers, clerks, librarians and clerks, and librarians, to be paid in strict conformity with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to fix and regulate the salaries of teachers, school officers, and other employees of the board of education of the District of Columbia," approved June 20, 1906, as amended by the acts approved May 26, 1908, and May 18, 1910, and June 26, 1912, $72,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee under what circumstances those having control of the schools in this District contracted obligations amounting to $72,000, as indicated in this item, and the additional sum, as indicated by the next paragraph, in excess of the amounts which have been appropriated.

Mr. WARREN. This is to fulfill the law, and I shall ask the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], who is acquainted with the matter, to explain the item.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, a number of teachers left the service here last fall. The estimate was not so high as is ordinarily carried in these bills, because it was believed the schools could get along with a lower amount; but in employing teachers to take the places of those who had gone away it was necessary to pay an increased salary. That places the District in this position at this time: The teachers have come back, and, as to the longevity pay to which they are entitled, they will have to wait until next fall for it, unless it is paid to them now. They have already received their checks each month, and many of them have but very little money. We therefore thought it was unfair to require them during all the summer vacation to go without the money that is actually due them as longevity pay.

Mr. KING. What is longevity pay?

Mr. CURTIS. Longevity pay is for length of service. Each year there is so much added to the compensation of a teacher who has taught for a certain length of time, up to five years.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 14, after line 10, to insert:

Allowance to principals: For allowance to principals of grade-school buildings for services rendered as such, in addition to their grade salary, to be paid in strict conformity with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to fix and regulate the salaries of teachers, school officers, and other employees of the board of education of the District of Columbia," approved June 20, 1906, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 7, before "1919," to strike out "March 22" and insert "May 30," so as to make the clause read:

Night schools: For teachers and janitors of night schools, including teachers of industrial, commercial, and trade instruction, and teachers and janitors of night schools may also be teachers and janitors of day schools, $12,000: Provided, That payment is authorized to all employees who served in the night schools during the period from March 8 to May 30, 1919, inclusive, at the rate of pay they were receiving on March 7, 1919, this payment to be in addition to the nominal sum of $1 which such teachers received for the service rendered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued down to the end of line 25, on page 15, the last item read being as follows:

METROPOLITAN POLICE.

Miscellaneous: For fuel, $1,300.

For maintenance of motor vehicles, $1,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if that is a deficiency, it is obvious that the department ought to know what the deficiency is. If they are seeking for an appropriation to cover a loss, they ought to know what the loss is. This appropriation is very indefinite. The item makes an appropriation of "$1,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. WARREN. As the Senator knows, it is not in order to change the item now. The item to which he calls attention is in the print of the House text.

Mr. KING. That is true, but it will relieve me of the necessity of calling attention to it later if the Senator will give the explanation now. If not, I shall be compelled to invite attention to it later.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Courts," on page 17, after line 18, to strike out:

Police court: For printing, law books, books of reference, etc., including the same objects specified under this head in the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1919, $710.70.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Charities and corrections," on page 18, after line 12, to strike out:

Washington asylum and jail: For provisions, fuel, forage, etc., including the same objects specified under this head in the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1919, $12,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, line 20, after "1919," to strike out "$30,000" and insert "$20,000," so as to make the clause read:

For maintenance of jail prisoners of the District of Columbia, including the same objects specified under this head in the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1919, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 20, line 5, after "1899," to strike out "$250" and insert "$500," so as to make the clause read:

For deportation of nonresident insane persons, in accordance with the act of Congress "to change the proceedings for admission to the Government Hospital for the Insane in certain cases, and for other purposes," approved January 31, 1899, $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 21, to insert:

EMERGENCY SHIPPING FUND.

For recruiting, instructing, and training officers, engineers, and crews for American vessels, and for all expenditures incidental thereto, $2,417,186.95.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Emergency Fleet Corporation has expended not only millions and hundreds of millions of dollars, but billions of dollars. I should like to know whether or not the investigations of the committee demonstrate the wisdom of the appropriations, the justice of them, and justify this large deficiency for the limited purposes for which the appropriation is to be used or has been used?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the general appropriation for the Emergency Fleet Corporation is not applicable to this particular line of service. This item represents what it will take to pay the expense of the particular service referred to up to the end of this fiscal year; that is, the end of the present month. As the Senator knows, there have been a large number of vessels at various times completed for the merchant marine and for other service, and there is a lack of sailors and officers educated or trained in the work of manning and navigating the vessels. The consequence is that not coincident with but following the appropriations for the building of ships it was necessary to build up the machinery, the human side of it as well as the other part, in order to put these ships into service. The shortage in this branch was not presented to the House because the officers of the corporation had not the opportunity to complete their calculations as to the enlistment of men in the service and to compute what was necessary to cover this emergency. So the item was left out until it came to the consideration of the Senate committee. If the Senator cares to have a little further information——

Mr. KING. I will be very glad to have it.

Mr. WARREN. I shall read briefly from the hearings. I quote from the testimony of Mr. Henry Howard, director this recruiting service, United States Shipping Board, as follows:

Mr. HOWARD. We have an appropriation in the bill which failed of passage at the last Congress, the deficiency bill, and owing to its failure we curtailed to the utmost in the interim. Our service, I might say, is training and providing personnel for the new ships that the Emergency Fleet Corporation is building, with trained officers, deck and engineer officers, seamen, firemen, cooks, oilers, and the whole personnel.

The CHAIRMAN. And this without any connection with the Navy Department?

Mr. HOWARD. It has nothing to do with the Navy. It is a civilian manning of the ships, and of course the burden has been much greater since the war is over, because we have been not only manning the new ships but the ships that the Navy formerly manned, which they are now turning over to us. We stopped completely our activities immediately after the failure of the passage of that bill, because we ran out of funds, and then it was thought it was such a serious matter and might cause a tie-up of so many ships that Commissioner Stevens took upon himself the responsibility of authorizing the use of some of the funds of the Division of Operations, surplus funds, something that is probably illegal.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you any estimates to propose? If so, in what form?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes. The appropriation for the recruiting service of the United States Shipping Board provided $6,250,000 for the training of officers and men for the merchant marine for the year ending June 30, 1919.

The expenditures for the nine months ended March 31, 1919, are as follows:

Operating expenditures	$5,326,615.37
Construction expenditures	425,836.34
Inventories	1,259,942.82
Accounts	154,792.42
Total	7,167,186.95

It is estimated that operating expenses for the months of April, May, and June will amount to $1,500,000, making the total expenditures $8,667,186.95 for the present fiscal year and necessitating a deficiency appropriation of $2,417,186.95 to meet the above expenditures.

The CHAIRMAN. By what authority is your board undertaking to create a deficiency of that size without some leave of Congress? I am not inquiring about it with any feeling against it, but the point is that this Government can not be run on a basis of every department spending what it chooses and coming in with it for deficiencies. The whole country is aflame now with the budget system, and we have an association here sending out literature about the budget, saying how much they will raise and how to spend it, and that it is to be divided and apportioned to these deficiencies. Now, where are we going to be at if we have such deficiencies, especially deficiencies of that size?

Mr. HOWARD. A deficiency on the basis that we estimated, if we had run full force, would have been about $4,000,000, which was approved by the last Congress and would have passed but for the filibuster. We had either to stop the thing at a severe damage to the interests of the Government having ships going out without crews to operate them or somebody had to run the risk of doing something a little illegal in the interests of the Government keeping the thing going. Mr. Stevens said that he was willing to assume the responsibility.

The CHAIRMAN. This was done by the corporation within the corporation?

Mr. HOWARD. No, sir; it was done by the Shipping Board. The recruiting service is not connected with the Emergency Fleet Corporation. It is responsible directly to the board and is working under appropriations directly.

The CHAIRMAN. It has nothing to do with the fleet department?

Mr. HOWARD. Nothing to do with the fleet proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. I notice on page 15 of the old bill which you have referred to——

Mr. HOWARD. No; page 45, lines 13 to 16.

The CHAIRMAN. Page 15 of the old bill as reported by Senator MARTIN, $3,750,000.

Mr. HOWARD. It is in the sundry civil bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; it is in the sundry civil and also in the proposed deficiency bill.

Mr. HOWARD. Let me read you this letter from the comptroller in the Division of Operations. I wrote to him telling him that I thought it would be necessary for us to appear before the House committee. He replied as follows [reading]:

"I took the matter up through Mr. Soleau with Mr. Shields, the clerk of the committee, who confirmed the original statement that I made to you.

"However, it now transpires that it is quite possible that the sundry civil bill, in which the appropriation was included for your service, may not become a law until after July 1. In this event the portion of the appropriation that was made available prior to June 30 might not become effective. It is therefore suggested that upon your arrival here Thursday you take up with the Senate Committee on Appropriations the proposition of including in a deficiency bill or an urgent deficiency bill now before them the amount of the deficit that will occur in your operations up to June 30 next."

The money has been spent. It has been borrowed, a portion of it, from another fund provided for another purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEW in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Department of State," on page 21, after line 5, to strike out:

For additional employees in the Department of State, $20,000: Provided, That not more than six persons shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $1,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Foreign intercourse," on page 21, line 14, after "1919," to strike out "$50,000" and insert "$100,000"; so as to make the clause read:

United States consulate: For contingent expenses of United States consulates, including the same objects specified under this head in the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation act for the fiscal year 1919, $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, line 18, after "1919," to strike out "$100,000" and insert "$200,000," so as to make the clause read.

Foreign missions: For contingent expenses of foreign missions, including the same objects specified under this head in the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation act for the fiscal year 1919, $200,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah, if he will be kind enough to answer me, if in one of the former appropriation bills provision was not made for these enlarged expenditures of the State Department owing to the war?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to my colleague that the regular appropriations were made in the Diplomatic appropriation bill for this service; but it now develops in the hearing that the $50,000 allowed by the House was not sufficient for the United States consulates, and that the $100,000 was not enough for foreign missions. The House thought it was, but the hearing before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations on the appropriation bill convinced the subcommittee that they required the $100,000 and the $200,000, respectively. I will say that I am not a member of that subcommittee now.

Mr. KING. My recollection is that when we were considering the appropriation bill of last year, the demands of the State Department for the Consular Service were rather large and were responded to by the Senate; and my recollection is that in the appropriation bill for this year the large demands were pretty generally acceded to by the Senate. I am surprised at these large deficits, in view of the very liberal appropriations which were made in the regular appropriation bills for 1918 and for 1919.

Mr. WARREN. I was somewhat surprised myself, and very much disposed to ignore those calls, but inasmuch as a thorough examination developed that they have followed since the time we appropriated, and have been increasing instead of decreasing, it seems to me that to cut this out now, or to cut out part of it, means that we shall have it in the next bill; and it was the intention of the subcommittee to cover this and put an end to this matter of coming in with these deficiencies. Of course, as the Senator knows, one of the ways to avoid these deficiencies hereafter is, if we can ascertain what absolutely must be expended, to give them that money and close the account.

I have here some letters that have come up to me from the Secretary of State; and if the Senator wishes them read, they were such as to convince the subcommittee handling the bill that those amounts ought to go in.

Mr. KING. I will not ask the Senator to put them in the RECORD or to read them; but if he can answer this one question it will be satisfactory to me: Are these increased amounts for the services of additional employees in the department or for additional consular agents abroad?

Mr. WARREN. No; nothing of that kind. So far as the employees are concerned, it means that they would have to be furloughed immediately, and that they have already rendered a part of this service. As to these other matters, as the Senator knows, the business of the State Department is largely with foreign countries, and is done by telegraphing and cabling, because the other countries nearby all communicate with each other by wire, and this country would be at a great disadvantage in every way if it did not adopt the same system; and, as the Senator knows, the expense of transmitting messages by wire his greatly increased, and that has largely entered into this contingency.

One of these items is for the relief and protection of American seamen. That means that where an American seaman is cast away somewhere and is picked up and taken care of, under the law, we have to cover the expense. The Senator would not, of course, like to leave accounts of that kind open.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, I was not alluding to that item at all. I was alluding to the item on line 14, page 21, where $100,000 has been allowed for contingent expenses of United States consulates.

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. KING. Then, on line 18, $200,000 has been allowed for foreign missions.

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. KING. That does not refer to the question of shipwrecked sailors.

Mr. WARREN. No.

Mr. KING. I was not challenging attention to the item last mentioned by the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. But in these contingent funds, what I have said about the wire and other expenses as well applies—that they have been greater than was expected when the appropriations were made.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask what the term "foreign missions" comprehends. If the members of the committee have had that item explained to them perhaps it would be wise for us to understand what the term "foreign missions" covers. Are they special missions sent to foreign countries or are they standing foreign missions?

Mr. WARREN. As the Senator knows, we have embassies, legations, and agencies; and the terms that they may apply there are not, of course, part of the expense in any way. Does the Senator desire the reading of the letters?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I did not mean to take the time of the Senate or to annoy the Senator. I wondered whether the term "foreign missions," as used here, included something more than the embassies and legations. Does it include special missions that are appointed to visit a country to undertake a special line of negotiation? For instance, we notice by the newspaper dispatches that during the peace conference at Paris all the countries, ourselves included, have been sending missions to Poland, missions to Roumania, to Czechoslovakia, and to Serbia. We have a mission now, I think, in Constantinople. They are appointed by the President to fill a temporary need, and I was wondering whether they were covered under this language.

Mr. WARREN. May I read to the Senator the original appropriation which this follows? The title is:

CONTINGENT EXPENSES, FOREIGN MISSIONS.

To enable the President to provide, at the public expense, all such stationery, blanks, records, and other books, seals, presses, flags, and signs as he shall think necessary for the several embassies and legations in the transaction of their business, and also for rent, repairs, postage, telegrams, furniture, typewriters, including exchange of same, messenger service, compensation of kavasses, guards, dragomans, and porters, including compensation of interpreters, and the compensation of dispatch agents at London, New York, San Francisco, and New Orleans, and for traveling and miscellaneous expenses of embassies and legations, and for printing in the Department of State, and for loss on bills of exchange to and from embassies and legations, and payment in advance of subscriptions for newspapers (foreign and domestic) under this appropriation is hereby authorized.

It is a separation of money that is expended by the Department of State and, of course, includes the embassies and legations, which seems to take in those agencies in addition. Of course, I will say to the Senator the language is not the language of the committee. It is the language that is presented by the Department of State and indorsed by the House, and comes to us in that form.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; but you see, Mr. President, the significant thing is that the item is doubled, and I was wondering if one of the reasons for doubling it was the existence of these special foreign missions during the last six months, as contrasted with the permanent foreign missions. In listening to the reading of that statute, I imagine that it is confined largely to taking care of the contingent expenses of permanent foreign missions; but the paragraph does not read that way. It reads:

For contingent expenses of foreign missions, including the same objects specified under this head in the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation act for the fiscal year 1919.

Mr. WARREN. Which I have just read.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; but it includes that and anything else under the term "foreign missions." Of course, some day the bill must be paid for the temporary foreign missions which we have now, I imagine, all over Europe during the progress of these peace negotiations, and I am merely endeavoring to ascertain whether those are being handled under an entirely separate account of which we have not had a view or whether, step by step, we are appropriating for them under this item.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that the members of the committee had before them at the last session an estimate of $5,000,000 for this foreign service, which they ignored.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I ask if a similar estimate has been sent to the committee at this session?

Mr. WARREN. We have not seen it yet. It may be on the House side. We have not received it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Did the State Department indicate to the committee at all in the course of the hearings, or the committee's examination of these items, how the expenses of our foreign missions of a special or temporary character are now being met?

Mr. WARREN. We had Mr. Carr before us and, so far as he is concerned, he alluded to these matters. Of course, he wanted more than the amount granted.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. WARREN. He wanted somewhat more than that, but it was finally concluded that he could work through until the first of the month with these appropriations. As I have said, quite the larger amount of this is owing to the increased cost of various matters. For instance, in their telegraph bill I remember just one item. I have forgotten how long a space of time it covered, but it was a matter of over $1,000,000 for cabling.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not criticizing the amount of money appropriated in this item. I was trying to locate exactly where it goes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 21, line 22, after the words "Philippine Islands," to strike out "$50,000" and insert "$60,000," so as to make the clause read:

For relief and protection of American seamen in foreign countries and in the Panama Canal Zone, and shipwrecked American seamen in the Territory of Alaska, in the Hawaiian Islands, Porto Rico, and the Philippine Islands, $60,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Treasury Department," on page 22, after line 1, to strike out:

OFFICE OF CHIEF CLERK AND SUPERINTENDENT.

Arlington Building and Annex: For equipment of the Arlington Building and Annex, including rugs and carpets, awnings, window shades and carriers, window ventilators, and bottle water coolers, $15,000, to continue available during the fiscal year 1920.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, after line 7, to strike out:

Treasury Department Annex, Pennsylvania Avenue and Madison Place: For equipment of the building, including rugs and carpets, awnings, window shades, window ventilators, and bottle water coolers, $3,000, to continue available during the fiscal year 1920.

The next amendment was, on page 22, after line 12, to strike out:

Treasury Department Annex, Fourteenth and B Streets NW.: For the following employees for care and maintenance of the building during the fiscal year 1920, at annual rates of compensation as follows: Carpenter, $1,200; plumber, $1,200; plumber's helper, $1,000; electrician, $1,200; wireman, $900; 3 mechanics, at $900 each; captain of the watch, $1,400; 2 lieutenants of the watch, at $900 each; 31 watchmen, at $720 each; janitor, $1,200; assistant janitor, $1,000; head of char force, $660; 2 assistant heads of char force, at $480 each; 120 charwomen, at $240 each; 12 male laborers, at $660 each; 4 female laborers, at $660 each; in all, $76,900.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 23, to strike out:

For heating, electric current, electrical equipment, ice, removal of trash, repairs, equipment, and miscellaneous expenses, fiscal year 1920, $33,548.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, after line 3, to strike out:

Darby Building: For heating, electric current, electrical equipment, ice, and miscellaneous items, fiscal year 1920, $6,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Contingent expenses," on page 23, after line 19, to strike out:

For rent of the Navy Annex Building on New York Avenue near Eighteenth Street NW., fiscal year 1920, $40,000; and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to accept from the Secretary of the Navy the long-term lease entered into by the Secretary of the Navy with the owners of the building known as the Navy Annex, located on New York Avenue near Eighteenth Street NW., Washington, D. C.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 24, after line 7, to strike out:

OFFICE OF THE TREASURER.

For amount required to increase the compensation of 26 expert counters, provided in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1920, from $720 to $900 each, $4,680.

National currency (reimbursable): For the following employees from July 1, 1919, to June 30, 1920, inclusive, at annual rates of compensation as follows:

Assistant tellers—1 $2,200, 1 $2,000; clerks—4 of class 4, 4 of class 3, 4 of class 2; expert counters—20 at $1,100 each, 30 at $900 each; 3 messengers at $840 each; messenger boy, $480; in all, $75,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Public Health Service," on page 27, after line 18, to insert:

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to acquire and complete immediately the hospital at Broadview, Cook County, Ill., authorized and appropriated for by an act entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to provide hospital and sanitarium facilities for discharged sick and disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines," approved March 3, 1919 (Public act No. 326, 65th Cong.).

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I would like to inquire of the Senator having charge of the bill what hearings, if any, were had regarding the propriety of purchasing this hospital, or rather the necessity for its purchase by an amendment to this bill. My reason for asking the question is that I have understood the Secretary of the Treasury and the Bureau of Health have been confronted with a great many conditions that were not at all satisfactory in regard to the hospital and that to take the unfinished building over, especially in its present condition, would be to saddle a very considerable burden upon the Treasury which it ought not to bear. In other words, the reason for the failure of the Secretary of the Treasury to act under the bill which we passed last February or early in March was not due to a lack of desire to secure these quarters, but to the terms which were imposed upon the Government by accepting the building in its present condition.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, there is a rather long story connected with the matter, but the committee had the Secretary of the Treasury before its subcommittee, and he testified, I will not say at great length but at considerable length, and not exactly along the line of what has been stated, but rather that he had not had the time to give this hospital, which under the bill required his approval, the attention it required; that it had come to him as he was just starting out on a campaign for the victory loan; that just before he went away he had asked for certain papers to take with him; that he asked the War Department to state why the contract which had been signed by those officers of the Army failed to receive the O. K. of the Secretary, and he also asked for information from the Public Health Service; that he learned from the Secretary of War that the War Department had ceased to function in the matter, because all these hospitals were to go over to the Public Health Service; that the Surgeon General of the Health Service and his senior assistants had examined this property and that the reports were somewhat conflicting; that he had one report that it had been unanimously approved and another that it was three to two, and stated that the three to two was the latest report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will suspend for a moment. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 120) to repeal chapter 154 of the act of the second session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, being the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution to authorize the President in time of war to supervise or take possession and assume control of any telegraph, telephone, or marine cable or radio system or systems, or any part thereof, and to operate the same in such manner as may be needful or desirable for the duration of the war, and to provide just compensation therefor," approved July 16, 1918.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I realize the importance of concluding the appropriation bill, and I ask unanimous consent temporarily to lay aside the unfinished business. In connection with that, however, I give notice that I expect to go on with it just as soon as the appropriation bill is completed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Senator from Wyoming will proceed.

Mr. WARREN. I will state to the Senator from Colorado that half an hour or an hour after the Secretary had left us he returned to say that he was mistaken or had overlooked the fact that there had been a late meeting of the Health Service officials with the Surgeon General and others who had later examined the property and who had approved it unanimously.

Mr. THOMAS. That is perfectly satisfactory to me. I do not care to have any further explanation.

Mr. KING. I should like to make an inquiry. I understand the Secretary of the Treasury has discretion for the completion of that building.

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. KING. Why should he be directed to immediately proceed with the construction of it? The Secretary of the Treasury, empowered and authorized, as he is, to construct the building, certainly would not abuse the discretion which is placed upon him. If the building is necessary, I see no reason why there should be such a direction. I see no reason why he should be directed to proceed immediately.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield in order that I may make a brief statement? This whole subject matter was fully investigated by a committee of the Senate during the last session, and a provision was reported in a bill which passed the Senate unanimously after the subject was discussed for almost an entire day. That provision required the Secretary to acquire the Speedway site and building. In conference, however, a modified provision was adopted which directed the Secretary to take over this project subject to a general proviso authorizing him to reject any project specified in the act if he found it was to the interest of the Government to do so. The emergency nature of this hospital project is admitted.

According to the evidence before the Senate Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and according to the investigations of three authorities in the War Department on different occasions, this is the best hospital project that has ever been submitted to the Government during the war. It is both the cheapest per bed and the best. In addition to that, it is a modern, up-to-date, fireproof hospital and the only one that is available.

Conditions in the Chicago district where this hospital is located make it imperative that this question should be promptly determined. Every authority that has investigated it, and it has been investigated over and over again, has reported not only favorably but urged its adoption.

The act was passed March 3, last. Several months have gone by and the service has suffered by reason of failure to determine this question. The Secretary of the Treasury has been a very busy man and has not finally disposed of the matter.

There was in the War Department at one time opposition to the project, but the opposition, to say the least of it, is not justified. The Secretary of the Treasury indicated at one time that he felt that Congress should have legislated emphatically rather than to have given him discretion. He has made no objection to the proposition. He at one time suggested that perhaps Congress should legislate affirmatively and that he felt, under the discretion vested in him, that it is his duty to make an independent and thorough investigation, and that investigation has not been completed.

Considering the emergency nature of the subject, the number of times it has been investigated, the conclusive evidence establishing it to be for the best interest of the Government and of the service, I express the hope that the provision will be adopted speedily.

Mr WARREN. On line 23, page 47, the word "sanatarium" is quoted from the law, but it should be "sanatorium."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TRAMMELL in the chair). Without objection, that amendment to the amendment of the committee will be made.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the chairman of the committee that this morning I had my attention called to this provision striking out all of pages 34 and 35 and down to and including line 20, on page 36. I sincerely hope that the amendment of the committee will be disagreed to, and for this reason: I find after a careful inquiry as to the buildings provided for here that they contain an area of 1,193,901 square feet, and if we do not provide for these temporary buildings they can not be occupied. The Public Buildings Committee have already decided that these temporary buildings are not going to be removed as long as we are leasing buildings in the District of Columbia. Therefore we will have to not only use every square foot of space in these buildings as they are used to-day, but we are going to make the employees who are already there use less space and move other departments or employees of our Government into these same buildings.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. The committee realized that this or a similar appropriation must be made; but these are appropriations for 1920, and my conception of the proper way to handle it—and I hoped that the Senate might agree to it—would be to incorporate it in the urgent deficiency bill or the sundry civil bill, which will come in time to cover this matter. There is no intention on the part of the committee of withholding the proper sum for this purpose, but the committee believed the other is the better way, and certainly we did not have the knowledge which the Senator from Utah has now given us about a survey of the buildings. We found that there had been changes continuously, and that a week or two later consultation on the part of the House and Senate would develop its great value and we would be able to put it in better form than it is here. There is no objection at all to making these appropriations in the proper way and at the proper time. If this is the proper time, there is no objection.

Mr. SMOOT. I think it is the proper time, and for the reason that it ought to be made in a deficiency bill rather than in the sundry civil bill, because it rightly belonged in the legislative bill, but for reasons that we thought good at that time they were not put in, because we thought these temporary buildings were going to be taken away. But that plan, Mr. President, I think I can say with positiveness, will not be followed.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask a question of the Senator?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Will there not be sufficient space in these temporary buildings to justify our surrendering a good many of the leases?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that within the next day or two we will have a complete survey of every building there is in the District of Columbia owned by the Government. We are going to ascertain the exact space per square foot in every one of those buildings and have a diagram showing where they are located, and showing the number of employees in every one of those buildings.

Let me call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there are bureaus in this Government to-day that have 487 square feet for every employee, while all that is necessary or all that is claimed by anyone as necessary is 65 square feet.

Mr. POMERENE. May I inquire what bureaus they are?

Mr. SMOOT. I want to make a complete report with reference to that at a later time, but I will say now one is the Food or Fuel Administration. I am going to lay the whole survey before the Senate just as quickly as we can get it completed, and that will be within a very short time.

Outside of one or two of the bureaus and departments of this Government, every one of them has more space than is absolutely necessary, and we are going to see if many of the leases can be canceled, but we want to cancel every lease in the District of Columbia and we want to see all the employees of the Government housed in buildings owned by the Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator's survey reveal the number of people who are employed in the various buildings and in the various bureaus? For instance, take the Food Department. Will it show how many are employed in that department?

Mr. SMOOT. It will show how many were employed on the 1st day of May. Of course, we can not bring it further down than that, but it will show the number of persons in every building, no matter what department, working on the 1st day of May, and the area in square feet which they are occupying in those buildings.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is it the Senator's personal work?

Mr. SMOOT. No; it is not my personal work, but I will say to the Senator from Tennessee that I will guarantee that it is right before I report it to the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad the Senator is undertaking it, and I hope it will soon come into the Senate.

Mr. POMERENE. I hope the survey will go further, and show how many hours some of these employees are at work.

Mr. SMOOT. That is a very good suggestion, although we have no authority to do that, I will say to the Senator. My opinion is that it would be a splendid thing not only for the employees but for the Government. Since I made the statement to one or two newspaper boys, with no idea of having it published, that I thought we ought to see that there are at least one-third of all the employees of the Government discharged and that the other two-thirds would do their work better without the one-third who would be discharged, I have received hundreds of letters from employees of the Government in which they say "the statement is without question correct, and if they would only give us the work to do"—and the letters generally come from the older employees—"we would see that the work was done and could be done just as well, if not better, with one-third of the employees discharged who are now in the employment of the Government."

Mr. POMERENE. I desire to say in connection with what has been said by the Senator from Utah that just the other day I learned of one of the bureaus or departments in which additional employees were being moved while those who were there at the time did not have enough to occupy them half of the time.

Mr. WARREN. As I have already stated, Mr. President, the committee has expected in due course of time to make this provision. My colleagues on the committee will agree with me that technically it is in no sense a deficiency.

Mr. SMOOT. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. Secondly, in no sense should we take it up in a deficiency bill as a matter of example for the future. I understand the circumstances. My honored colleague, with others, has made this survey which I dare say will be another evidence of his thoroughness of work. I am perfectly willing at this time to allow these 1920 matters to go in, knowing as I do that they must be correct with this additional testimony, but I must beg my colleague to try with me to prevent these things in the first place from being deficiencies, and, second, not to undertake to have deficiencies for something that has not yet occurred or for time that has not yet elapsed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Naval Establishment," subhead "Bureau of Construction and Repair," on page 39, line 8, after the words "sum of," to strike out "$900,000" and insert "$1,000,000," so as to make the clause read:

The limitation specified in the naval appropriation act for the fiscal year 1919 on expenditures for draftsmen and other technical services from the appropriation "Construction and repair of vessels" is increased by the sum of $1,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under subhead "Public buildings," on page 40, after line 1, to insert:

Capitol Buildings: For work at the Capitol and for general repairs thereof, including cleaning and repairing works of art, flags for the east and west fronts of the center of the Capitol and for Senate and House Office Buildings; flagstaffs, halyards, and tackle; wages of mechanics and laborers; purchase, maintenance, and driving of motor-propelled, passenger-carrying office vehicles; and not exceeding $100 for the purchase of technical and necessary reference books and city directory, $5,000; to be available until expended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 40, after line 10, to insert:

Maltby Building: For an additional amount to convert the building known as the Maltby Building into suitable condition for office purposes, said work and expenditures hereunder to be under the supervision and direction of the Superintendent of the United States Capitol Buildings and Grounds, to be available until expended, $4,400.

Mr. WARREN. On line 15 the word "Buildings" should be in the singular.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that change will be made.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the chairman of the committee tell us what is proposed to be done with the Maltby Building?

Mr. WARREN. It is now being used for a Government purpose.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is occupied by the Vocational Board?

Mr. WARREN. Yes. The Superintendent of Buildings, Mr. Elliott Woods, appeared before the committee with reference to that matter. It appears he was instructed to prepare it for a certain number, I think 200, and he says he is now required to make additional repairs in order to make it ready for four or five hundred additional employees. I think the building, whatever may become of it, will be useful.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The next amendment was, on page 40, after line 16, to insert:

Courthouse, District of Columbia: For reconstruction and furnishing of the courthouse, District of Columbia, including material and labor, and for each and every item incident thereto, to be expended under the direction of the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds, to be available until expended, $57,000, one-half to be paid out of the Treasury and one-half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

And the proper authority shall submit to Congress detailed estimates of appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for each fiscal year thereafter so long as the said act remains in effect, for personal services and all other expenses required in the District of Columbia and elsewhere to provide for the care, rental, maintenance, and operation of properties as authorized by law.

So as to make the clause read:

The sum of $32,500,000 and all other sums of the unexpended balance of the appropriations heretofore made for carrying out the provisions of the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to provide housing for war needs," approved May 16, 1918, shall be covered into the Treasury immediately upon the passage of this act: Provided, That all revenues on hand June 30, 1919, and all revenues derived thereafter from the exercise of the authority contained in the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to provide housing for war needs," approved May 16, 1918, as amended by the deficiency appropriation act approved June 4, 1918, including revenues from rentals, the operation of properties, the disposal of properties, the repayments of loans, and the interest on loans, shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts. And the proper authority shall submit to Congress detailed estimates of appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for each fiscal year thereafter so long as the said act remains in effect, for personal services and all other expenses required in the District of Columbia and elsewhere to provide for the care, rental, maintenance, and operation of properties as authorized by law.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the chairman of the committee explain this item of $32,500,000 for housing on account of war needs after the war is over?

Mr. WARREN. This is not an appropriation. It is going to put money back into the Treasury. It was determined to turn back $40,000,000, but on evidence before the committee it seemed there was not $40,000,000, and consequently we put it at $32,500,000, or whatever it may be, because they might refuse to turn back any of a stated sum of exactly $40,000,000 when they had but $32,500,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. What has become of the difference between the $32,500,000 and the $40,000,000?

Mr. WARREN. They say that there was a mistake made in the information which the House had.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Legislative," on page 54, after line 5, to strike out:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 54, after line 11, to insert:

To pay Susan Shoemaker for services rendered as additional clerk to Hon. CHARLES L. MCNARY, from November 6, 1918, to December 9, 1918, $113.33.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question. There are certain provisions on pages 54, 55, and 56 with reference to the pay of Senators' clerks. There were some new clerks who were authorized at the last session and some additional increases.

Mr. WARREN. Those are all covered in a lump-sum appropriation further on.

Mr. POMERENE. So that the entire situation is met by this bill?

Mr. WARREN. Yes; it is.

Mr. POMERENE. Very well.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 56, after line 3, to insert:

To reimburse the official reporters of the proceedings and debates of the Senate for clerical expenses actually and necessarily incurred from July 1, 1918, to May 31, 1919, $5,475.52.

The next amendment was, on page 57, after line 4, to insert:

The unexpended balance of the appropriation for refrigerating apparatus for the Senate and House wings of the Capitol and Senate and House Office Buildings, and for each and every purpose connected therewith, including the cooling of the air supplied to the Senate Chamber and the Hall of the House, completion of the ice-water plants in the Senate and House Office Buildings, for labor, materials, and personal services, made in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1912, is hereby made available, to provide at all times an equable temperature and a sufficient supply of pure fresh air for the Senate Chamber, together with the additional sum of $42,000 for said purposes, including labor, materials, and personal services, which is hereby appropriated, to be available until expended.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations as to the appropriations on pages 56 and 57. Are the appropriations under which the bathrooms are carried, in the Senate Office Building, embraced in those items? What does the appropriation for that purpose come under?

Mr. WARREN. They are not embraced in those appropriations. I am not able to tell the Senator under what sum they are supported. I think the mere act of opening them requires no expense. I understand they were opened before the close of the last session of Congress. I only have that information as a passer-by. I know nothing whatever of the circumstances.

Mr. KENYON. It was heralded in the newspapers, Mr. President, that the first act of the Republicans coming into power was to open marble bathrooms in the Senate Office Building. Upon inquiry I found that that was done by the Democrats through their Committee on Rules before its membership was changed. So, in order to keep the record straight, I hope it may be known that the "unwashed Democracy," and not the Republicans, opened the marble bathrooms.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I want to plead guilty to the proposition which the Senator from Iowa has just stated about opening these bathrooms, and I want to give the condition.

In the first place, the "unwashed Democracy" did not build these marble bathrooms which were modeled after the days of Cæsar, but they were built by the Senator's side of the Chamber. However, being built and being in the building and not being used, the bathrooms being locked up, and considering the crowded condition of boarding houses and places where the clerks at the Capitol had to live, they found it difficult to get access to bathrooms. Therefore the committee opened them to the extent of having somebody turn on the water and furnish the clerks with towels. So I am sure that the "unwashed Democracy" was taken care of in a very proper way.

Mr. KENYON. That is good, if that is actually what happened.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is really the case.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator say now that the clerks are permitted to go into those luxurious marble bathrooms and have their baths? If so, I am going to withhold my opposition.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not know what has happened during the last few weeks because I have never been in those marble bathrooms. I understand they are magnificent. But having been built magnificently there is no reason why they should be shut up. You might as well turn on the spigot for a clerk in a magnificent palace, if it is there, as if you had a hydrant out in the yard.

Mr. KENYON. I agree with the Senator, but I want to ask a question. Can the clerks go to these bathrooms? Have they the privileges of these baths?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand that is the fact. It was so when they were opened by the Rules Committee under the Democrats.

Mr. KENYON. I thought the Democratic Party was entitled to be congratulated on closing those bathrooms at the time they came into power. I am sorry that they erred.

Mr. THOMAS. Let me ask the Senator is not his objection to these baths the fact that a Senator may possibly use one of them; that he is perfectly satisfied provided the populace in general could use these baths, so long as Senators should be excluded from them? Is that the Senator's position?

Mr. KENYON. No; my position is that public money should not be expended for bathing Senators any more than for clothing them or giving them cigars or shaving them.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not know but what the Senator is correct; but we strain sometimes at that sort of a gnat and at the same time we swallow a great many expensive camels without a single protest.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 57, after line 18, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay from the appropriation for clerks and messengers to committees for the fiscal year 1919, to Don C. Clayton, for services rendered as clerk to the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, from October 25 to 27, 1918, both inclusive, at the rate of $2,220 per annum and additional compensation at the rate of $120 per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 58, to insert:

For expenses of inquiries and investigations ordered by the Senate, including compensation to stenographers to committees, at such rate as may be fixed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, but not exceeding $1 per printed page, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 58, after line 5, to insert:

The next amendment was, on page 58, after line 12, to insert:

For purchase of furniture for refitting 10 rooms in the Senate terrace for occupancy by Senate committees and Senators, fiscal years 1919 and 1920, $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 58, after line 16, to insert:

Senate Office Building: Toward the construction of the fireproof building for committee rooms and offices for the United States Senate, provided for in the sundry civil act approved April 28, 1904, fiscal years 1919 and 1920, $2,500, said sum to be expended by the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds under the supervision of the Committee on Rules, United States Senate.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I want to propound a query to the Senator having charge of this bill, which I have asked on one or two similar occasions, regarding the Senate Office Building. This provision appropriates $2,500 toward the construction of a fireproof building for committee rooms and offices for the Senate, and so forth. That building is uncompleted. I think the Senate took possession of it something like 12 or 13 years ago. The steps, for example, leading from the street to the doorway at the lower end of the building constitute one of the few uncompleted portions of the structure. I have never been able to understand why that building was not completed. It has been once or twice said that there is a provision in the original bill, or somewhere in the statutes, which keeps the present manager of the building in control until it is completed. Whether that be true or not, it is a singular circumstance that the building itself remains in an uncompleted state. There should be some rational explanation of the facts. This is an inquiry to which I have never received a satisfactory reply.

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] has been on the Committee on Appropriations for a great many years. He is perhaps as familiar as is any Member of this body with the history not only of that building but of many others which have been erected in the interval and which have been fully completed, and he may perhaps be able to give us some information.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I take it that the Senator's inquiry is mainly directed to the wooden staircase down near the northwestern corner of the building.

Mr. THOMAS. I mention that as the most striking feature of the uncompleted part of the building; but what is true of that is also true of a number of other entrances.

Mr. WARREN. Would the Senator mention some of the more important ones?

Mr. THOMAS. Well, the exit from the wing farthest from this building at the lower end is incomplete. There are two exits there, and they are both practically barred up. Then there is one to the court, which I think is on the first floor, possibly upon the second floor; but there are a number of little matters which ought not to cost very much and which I think ought to be completed.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, there was some hesitation about the stairways. The stairway most used, the one directly opposite the Capitol Building, was found to be very dangerous in winter. Men have been blown off there, and several Senators have received quite severe bruises. It has been necessary at times, as the Senator knows, to put up a false wooden stairway. At one time there was objection to finishing the entrance at the northwestern corner by those Senators who occupy the part of the building nearest those northwest steps. I understand, unless there is some objection offered, that the Superintendent of the Capitol expects to have in the sundry civil bill certain sums to cover that and other improvements which may be made from time to time.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator why it is necessary to have a separate office as superintendent of that building? Why can not the Superintendent of the Capitol Building also look after the very small duties that are incumbent upon the superintendent of that building?

Mr. WARREN. As the Senator from Tennessee knows, there is but one Superintendent of the Capitol Building—Mr. Elliott Woods.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is my understanding. How does it happen that the superintendent of that building—whose name is Werner, I believe, a good German name, of course—is kept as the superintendent of the building?

Mr. WARREN. I think the Senator from Tennessee will agree that there should be some responsible person there to see that the employees are at their stations and that the building is properly cleaned and cared for.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why can not Mr. Woods have that done? He has ample time, and, as I understand, Mr. Werner is kept there simply as superintendent of the uncompleted building. That is a fiction, of course.

Mr. WARREN. So far as Elliott Woods is concerned, I might say to the Senator that Elliott Woods does not have time to attend to those duties which we have imposed on him. He was the architect as well as the superintendent of these structures. He is the architect of the courthouse used by the appelate court, and he is the architect in charge now of the old courthouse building.

Mr. McKELLAR. But why should he have charge of any buildings except just this one?

Mr. WARREN. He does have charge of them all. You may call Mr. Werner a superintendent or foreman or chief of employees, but he is a subordinate.

Mr. McKELLAR. My understanding is that he is an independent superintendent——

Mr. WARREN. Not at all.

Mr. McKELLAR. That he is kept on as the superintendent of an incomplete building.

Mr. WARREN. The fact that there are certain portions of the building not completed has nothing to do with his duties. He would be there just the same if the building was entirely completed.

Mr. McKELLAR. It would make no difference, then, so far as he is concerned?

Mr. WARREN. I think it would be exactly the same.

Mr. McKELLAR. What is the superintendent of that building paid?

Mr. WARREN. I am not certain; I should have to look it up; but it is not a large sum.

Mr. McKELLAR. This $2,500 is a small sum, relatively speaking, but what is it to be used for?

Mr. WARREN. It is desired to divide up a number of rooms for the accommodation of the Senate and Senators, and in other cases to make suites. It has been found necessary to make entrances from one suite of rooms into another or into one of the larger rooms; and there is now an order, for instance, to move the stationery rooms from the Capitol Building to the Office Building, which would require the buying of some new shelves and adding to the old ones and otherwise properly fitting up the quarters.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is there any other appropriation out of which that is ordinarily done?

Mr. WARREN. I know of none.

Mr. McKELLAR. This is the only appropriation?

Mr. WARREN. I think so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Government Printing Office," on page 61, line 19, before the name "Joseph De Fontes," to insert "and"; in line 20, before the word "messengers," to strike out "and Charles C. Allen"; and in line 22, after the words "in all," to strike out "$2,800" and insert "$2,100," so as to make the clause read:

The next amendment was, on page 86, line 14, to change the number of the section from 6 to 7.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to come in as a new section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill it is proposed to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 8. That no limitation contained in section 7 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1920 shall deprive mechanics, laborers, and workmen employed at the arsenals or navy yards of the $240 increase provided therein by reason of their having received during the fiscal years 1919 or 1920 an increase at a rate in excess of $200 per annum, unless such increase amounts in the aggregate for the fiscal years 1919 or 1920, respectively, to over $200.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I shall have to make a point of order against that amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I hope the Senator will reserve the point of order.

Mr. WARREN. I shall reserve the point of order for the present.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, during the fiscal year 1918 Congress provided for an increase in the compensation of Government employees of from 5 to 10 per cent, depending upon the salary received. For the fiscal year 1919 this was replaced by a lump-sum bonus of $120 per annum. The result was that the compensation of some of those who were getting the benefit of the 5 and 10 per cent increase was in fact reduced. Then, for the year ending June 30, 1920, we have provided a bonus of $240, but there was a limitation attached to the effect that if during the year 1919 or 1920 any employee shall have received an increase of salary at the rate of $200 he shall not have the benefit of the $240 bonus. The language in that respect is substantially the same as when we made provision for the $120 bonus. The effect of that is illustrated by what actually happened in some of the navy yards of the country. On the 1st of July, 1918, the employees received a basic increase in pay of 8 cents a day. Then, I think about the 1st of November, they received an increase——

Mr. KING. Does the Senator mean 8 cents an hour or 8 cents a day?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think it was a per diem increase. Then, about the 1st of November they received an increase of 56 cents, making a total increase of 64 cents. As a matter of fact, the actual increase which they received during that year on account of these increases amounted, I think, to $137 and some cents, or under $200; but if they had received this increase for each day in the year it would have amounted to $200.32, or 32 cents more than the $200, and therefore they could not get the benefit of the $240 bonus. In other words, according to the holding of the department, if they received an increase at the rate of $200 a year, although during the year they actually received only an increase of from $50 to $75, they are not entitled to the benefit of the $240 bonus.

The effect of my amendment is simply to provide that if the aggregate increase in the year does not exceed $200, then the employee shall get the advantage of the $240 bonus. I think that was really the intention of Congress when this legislation was passed. A provision similar to my amendment was inserted in the last legislative appropriation bill, but went out in conference. Then, at the close of the last session of Congress we put it on the deficiency bill as the committee reported it; but the deficiency bill did not pass. I think it is a simple matter of justice to some of the employees in the navy yards and in the arsenals. They are the only ones who are affected by it.

It was suggested in the committee, and has since been suggested outside, that they may get the benefit of the $240 increase by stopping work, by quitting their jobs after they had obtained an increase up to, say, $180. That may be true; but they will not do it.

The language of the law applies to Government clerks just the same as it does to employees in the navy yards and arsenals, but we have not heard of Government clerks quitting in order to get the benefit of the bonus, inasmuch as if they would continue to the end of the year they would not get the benefit of it because of increased salary. So that I do not think there is any force in that suggestion. It seems to me that this is simply an act of justice to employees in the navy yards and the arsenals. I understand that, as a matter of fact, in all of those places, except one or two, the employees have been given the benefit of the bonus, but on account of the construction placed upon the provision by some one a discrimination has been worked against some of the employees.

Mr. KING. When would this become operative?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It would become operative on the 1st of July.

Mr. KING. As I understand, the bonus is not paid monthly, but is paid at the end of the year, so that——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think it is paid monthly.

Mr. WARREN. It is paid monthly.

Mr. KING. I was not advised of that fact.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think it is, but I may be mistaken.

Mr. KING. Of course, if it is not paid until the end of the year, then there would be no necessity for any legislation, assuming the conditions which the Senator suggests to be correct, until a year from now.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think the bonus is paid in monthly installments. The $240 begins to be paid from the beginning of the fiscal year.

Mr. KING. Can the Senator find any reason why heretofore in conference a provision similar to that which he has just offered to this bill was eliminated from the bill?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; I was not on the conference, and I do not know what the special reasons were.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think that this is new legislation that ought to be considered as an independent bill, rather than being attached as a rider to a general appropriation bill?

Mr. JONES of Washington. There is no question that the point of order is good. It is legislation on an appropriation bill, but the law which it is intended to change will begin to operate on the 1st of July, and if we do not get the legislation through now it will be too late, for even if we secured it in the future I am sure it would not be made retroactive; so that this is the time, it seems to me, for us to take care of it.

That is all I can say. I hope the Senator in charge of the bill will feel justified in not insisting upon the point of order. I know that the subcommittee reported against it and that the full committee did not put it on. I think it was not put on, however, because they did not fully understand the circumstances. I know the embarrassing position in which it places the chairman of the committee, and probably, if he should not make the point of order, other amendments might be offered; but I hope that he will feel justified in not insisting upon it in this instance.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I think I ought to say before renewing the point of order, on which I certainly shall insist, that we have two classes of employees in the Government. One class receives statutory salaries, paid on an annual basis, on a scale which has prevailed for the last 30 or 40 years, namely, clerk of class 1, $1,200; clerk of class 2, $1,400; clerk of class 3, $1,600; clerk of class 4, $1,800. It has been found necessary, or has seemed wise, during the rise in prices incident to war times to increase this basic pay, and consequently, after a great deal of study on the part of the House, and later on the part of the committee of the Senate, there was approximately $120 per annum added for the fiscal year 1918 to the pay of all clerks receiving up to and including a certain amount. As I recall, the original increase was 10 per cent to those who were not receiving in excess of $1,200 a year and 5 per cent to those receiving more than $1,200 a year but not more than $1,800 a year, amounting to practically $120. The 1919 provision was a bonus of $120 to all clerks receiving not more than $2,500 per annum. This year we again took up the matter and undertook to provide for that class of employees by granting a bonus of $240 a year, or $20 a month, for the fiscal year 1920.

We have another class of employees, namely, those working under commissions and in the various bureaus that were organized during the war, which make their own prices, fix their own salaries, taking my clerks and the clerks of other Senators away from us by offering them great advances in pay. Requests are coming in now from these various bureaus and commissions to give their employees the benefit of the $240 bonus, where they in some cases receive anywhere from 25 to 50 per cent more compensation than the statutory-roll employees receive. I have here a suggested amendment covering, with one exception, all the employees of the Government that are not included on the statutory roll.

So, Mr. President, I feel it necessary to make the point of order, which is that the amendment proposes to add a new item of appropriation which has not been estimated for by any department; that it has not been proposed by a standing committee, but has been refused by the subcommittee and refused by the full committee; and that it is new legislation on an appropriation bill. I make that point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts in the chair). The Chair sustains the point of order under Rule XVI.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, it is necessary for me at 3 o'clock to attend a meeting of the Committee on Military Affairs. Before I go I wish to ask unanimous consent to present an amendment to the pending bill, that it lie upon the table until it can be reached in regular order, and I ask that I may be notified when that comes about.

Mr. McKELLAR. The bill is about to be passed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Let me ask the chairman of the committee what is the status of the bill?

Mr. WARREN. It is now open to amendment, the committee amendments having been completed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Very well. I offer the amendment now. I did not realize that the reading of the bill had been completed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. That the accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to reopen and adjust the claims of the State of New York for which appropriation was made by the act of Congress approved February 27, 1906, on the basis of the claims of Pennsylvania and Delaware, with the same force and effect as though appropriations therefor had not been made and accepted by said State.

Mr. KING. I do not know what that amendment is or the scope or extent of it. If the Senator will submit a word or two in explanation, I am sure it will be gratifying to Senators other than myself.

Mr. WADSWORTH. This matter is one which has been pending for some time, in one form or another, before the Congress. It seems that in the settlement of claims made by several of the States arising out of advances of money made to the Federal Government in the War of 1812, two different theories have been used by the Auditor for the Treasury Department. It seems that in the settlement of one set of claims, under a certain ruling of the Auditor for the Treasury Department, the claim of the State of New York was settled and payment was made to the State. I think that was approximately in the year 1906. A short time after that the Auditor for the Treasury Department changed his ruling, which involved a considerable change in the method of computing the original claims. Two of the States—and they were the only two remaining at that time—had their claims audited under this new ruling of the auditor. Those two States were Pennsylvania and Delaware.

The State of New York, according to my information, is the only State which can possibly request legislation of this sort. The State of New York has believed, and its State administration has upon occasion asserted its belief, that its claim should be settled upon the same basis as the claims of other States, and the same method of computation used in arriving at the settlement. This amendment is to authorize the Auditor for the Treasury Department to reopen and readjust the claim of the State of New York upon the same principles and the same theories as has been done with other States.

Mr. POMERENE. What is the amount of this claim?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not know that I can give the Senator an accurate estimate of the difference which might be paid to the State under a reopened and readjusted claim. My information is that it could not exceed $100,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, do I understand that these are claims of the hoary age of more than 100 years?

Mr. WADSWORTH. They would seem to be of about that age. As a matter of fact, they were not settled until 1906, and they have not been settled upon an equitable basis as between the States, and the State of New York merely asks that it be treated like the others.

Mr. KING. Do the claims arise out of the appropriation by the Federal Government of property belonging to individuals, or out of advances made by the States to the Federal Government during the War of 1812?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Advances made by the States; and I may assure the Senator that interest does not run to date.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator know why there has been such a long delay in the settlement of claims of this character? It seems to me the statute of limitations ought to be successfully pleaded, or at least the laches of the State, in a claim that is more than $100,000.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I could not tell the Senator. I was not here during that century. I know they were settled in 1906.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, perhaps I can enlighten the Senator on that point. In these days of red tape it takes about 100 years for any claim to be considered; and even then, in nine cases out of ten, it is considered unfavorably.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The States pressed for the settlement of the claims for many, many years; and the Auditor or Comptroller of the Treasury Department apparently got mixed up in his method of computation, and the one State left to suffer under that method of computation was the poor State of New York.

Mr. KING. It seems to me that States that failed to press their claims for so long a time ought not to receive any consideration. Unquestionably this is new legislation; but I shall leave it to the chairman of the committee, exercising that wise discretion which he exhibits on all occasions, to insist upon the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 64, after line 11, it is proposed to insert the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Walston H. Brown, sole surviving partner of the firm of Brown, Howard & Co., the sum of $65,792.53, and to the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. the sum of $26,400.30, these being the amounts severally found due the said Walston H. Brown & Co. and the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. by the Court of Claims and transmitted to Congress on the 7th day of February, 1914.

Mr. MOSES obtained the floor.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, if the Senator from New Hampshire will excuse me just a moment, I know the claim. The bill has passed each House of Congress at one session or another, but never both Houses during the same session. Of course it is a claim, and under the rules could not be put in an appropriation bill. It can be offered by unanimous consent, of course. The chairman does not feel that on an offer of this kind it is necessary to object, but will let the Senate consider the matter as it thinks best.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. That the second paragraph of section 7 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"The provisions of this section shall not apply to the following: Employees paid from the postal revenues and sums which may be advanced from the Treasury to meet deficiencies in the postal revenues; employees of the Panama Canal on the Canal Zone; employees of the Alaskan Engineering Commission in Alaska; employees paid from lump-sum appropriations in bureaus, divisions, commissions, or any other governmental agencies or employments created by law since January 1, 1916, except the civilian employees of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and of the office of the Alien Property Custodian; employees whose duties require only a portion of their time, except charwomen, who shall be included; employees whose services are utilized for brief periods at intervals; persons employed by or through corporations, firms, or individuals acting for or on behalf of or as agents of the United States or any department or independent establishment of the Government of the United States in connection with construction work or the operation of plants; employees who receive a part of their pay from any outside sources under cooperative arrangements with the Government of the United States or the District of Columbia; employees who serve voluntarily or receive only a nominal compensation; and employees who may be provided with special allowances because of their service in foreign countries. The provisions of this section shall not apply to employees of the railroads, express companies, telegraph, telephone, marine cable, or radio system or systems taken over by the United States, and nothing contained herein shall be deemed a recognition of the employees of such railroads, express companies, telegraph, telephone, marine cable, or radio system or systems as employees of the United States."

SEC. 2. That the additional compensation provided for in said section 7 of said act as amended shall be paid to the civil employees of the office of the Alien Property Custodian at the full rate provided in said section from and after the 30th day of June, 1918, and so much as may be necessary to pay said additional compensation to said employees from said 30th day of June, 1918, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I make the point of order against the amendment. It is legislation of several kinds. It never has been estimated for. It has not been presented by any standing committee. It is legislation which appropriates large amounts of money in addition to what has been estimated by the department.

Mr. McKELLAR. Unquestionably, Mr. President, the amendment is subject to a point of order. The purpose of it is just to put all the employees on the same basis so far as bonuses are concerned. It is subject to a point of order, without doubt.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if I may be pardoned, I think it ought to be stated, emphasizing what the Senator from Wyoming has said, that the employees who are receiving compensation under statutory provisions which fixed their compensation years ago, and there has been no particular augmentation in their salaries for many, many years, ought not to be put in the same class as the employees in these new bureaus and these new agencies where they have received compensation higher than the statutory compensation. I think it would be manifestly unjust to put them in the same class.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I was out of the Chamber when the Senate passed on the amendment providing for the appropriation of $2,400,000 to pay a deficit in the so-called recruiting service. Perhaps it is too late to give it further consideration. I am not prepared to move a reconsideration, because I have not sufficient facts; but I do want to point out to the Senate at this time the statement of Mr. Howard, representing that bureau, as far as I can analyze it, in which he says, on page 93, that the class now consists of 825 sailors or men being taught the work of the merchant-marine sailor. There are 825 men in the class, and there is a deficit of $2,400,000.

While I appreciate that this does not include all the things that would come under consideration, just that one thought would mean that those men are costing the Goverment approximately $3,000 each for their education. It seems to me it might be better for us to consider paying some type of bonus or subsidy to get men to prepare themselves for the merchant-marine service, if my analysis of this very brief statement is correct.

In addition to the deficit of $2,400,000, it is admitted here that an appropriation of $6,250,000 has already been expended for the same purpose. I do not know how many men have been turned out. This service has only been in operation for nine months, and I presume it is a four or five months' course, so I assume there has not been a very large class turned out, and it does seem to me a very unusual and expensive appropriation for a very necessary service.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I have been detained from the Chamber, and have had no opportunity to pay the attention to the bill that I ought to have paid. I am a member of the Committee on Appropriations, but failed to receive the notice that was sent me at the time the committee had it under investigation; but it was no fault either of the clerk or of the chairman of the committee that I did not receive the notice, for it was sent to my apartments instead of to my office, and was not handed to me in time for me to know anything about it.

I see on page 58, line 13, the following:

For purchase of furniture for refitting 10 rooms in the Senate terrace for occupancy by Senate committees and Senators, fiscal years 1919 and 1920, $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

I wish to add an amendment to that, and I do not think it ought to meet any opposition from any Member of the Senate. The body is very nearly equally divided.

I have an infirmity, well known to my friends, that prevents me from reaching the Senate Chamber from my office in the Senate Office Building, on a call of the yeas and nays, in time to respond. We all know how much time we are compelled to spend in our Senate Office Building rooms, or in our private rooms, when we have no chairmanship of a committee that carries with it a room in the Capitol. I think it is better, not only for this hour but for the coming hour, that those rooms that are to be occupied by individual Senators should be equally divided between the minority and the majority of the Senate at the time, leaving the present rule untouched as to the disposition of these rooms; for we often find, aside from the mere question of seniority, that Senators, no matter what may be their infirmities or necessities, have no chance, no opportunity, to secure a room near the Senate Chamber.

I have been turned out from a room that has been occupied for a long time by the minority of the Senate, and I am not complaining. It was occupied by Senator Bacon the whole time he was here, and before him other Democrats had occupied it. It was assigned to me. It was very inconvenient in a way, having to go through the Document Room of the Senate in order to get to it, and when the Senate is not in session I have to carry more keys than the Secretary of the Treasury in order to get into your own room. Yet that was assigned to me, never having been assigned before to anybody as far as the record shows and my knowledge goes; but that was one of the rooms which the Democrats, in order of seniority, had to take if they got any. It was selected by my friend Senator OVERMAN, of North Carolina, who is entitled to one of these rooms.

I see, in walking through the corridors, the chairmen of great committees who have rooms half as big as this, who still have private rooms near the Senate Chamber, very convenient, very necessary to men who can not get to their offices and back in time for a roll call. Now, it seems to me that we might at least put in this bill a provision that when those rooms are fixed up they shall go to the minority and to the majority in equal proportions.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator whether these rooms are now occupied.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. They are not. They are being fitted up for occupancy. They used to be occupied, for I remember that in my days in the House I found that Senator Blackburn was down there, Senator OVERMAN himself was there, Senator SMOOT was there, and many of the older Senators now here; and I take this public occasion to thank the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] for his great kindness in permitting me to occupy the room for the business that I had to transact during the sessions of the Senate.

Now, Mr. President, I move——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I greatly sympathize with what the Senator has just said; but I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that, under the rules, of course, the Committee on Rules has the disposition of the rooms. If this provision is allowed to pass as it is and the minority Members of this body call the attention of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] to the matter, I have not any doubt but that satisfactory arrangements will be made. I say this simply because if it becomes a provision of law those rooms will virtually have to be separated from all the other rooms hereafter, and it may work a hardship for either side that may be in the majority; but I do believe that if the Senator will call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Rules to the fact that these rooms are to be fitted up he will take a special interest in it and will do what is absolutely just.

I really hope the Senator will not offer an amendment on the subject to this bill, because it will hereafter apply to the rooms, no matter what may come or what changes may be made.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I always receive with great attention any suggestion made to me by the Senator from Utah. I have reason to feel that way about it, and it appeals to me; but I want a Senate resolution, then, if possible. I do not want to put it in a crystallized law. That is a suggestion that strikes me favorably; but I should be glad if we could get a Senate resolution through this body saying that that shall be done. If it is done, either by Senate resolution or by law, my service in this body not being as long as that of other men, and not wanting to put myself forward as a claimant for any favor to which a man of older service is entitled, I would not feel like appealing even to the Senator from Pennsylvania to take me out of the rule; but I would concede that any Senator had the right above me, no matter whether I could get over here or not or whether I had one leg or two. But that does not matter. There ought to be a fair division of these rooms, no matter who is in the majority; and any Senator who has a great committee, and a suite of two or three rooms in connection with it, ought, as a matter of common right and justice to other Senators, to surrender any private room he happens to have in the Capitol Building and use one of the rooms attached to his great committee for his private use. It seems to me that suggestion would appeal as a matter of propriety to Senators, without any action upon the part of the Senate to enforce it, even if it were inclined to do so.

In answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Utah, I see the propriety and the force of it, and I will not offer the amendment that I had intended to offer; but I give notice that I will introduce a resolution to that effect, and I hope to have not only the concurrence of the Committee on Appropriations but the concurrence of the sense of fairness upon the part of Senators to have it pass in a resolution that the Senate afterwards can control at its pleasure.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, word has just been received from the department by the chairman of the committee of a correction that should be made on line 13, page 49. It seems that in the House text here the appropriation is made for the year 1919, when it should be 1918. I ask unanimous consent to reconsider and insert "1918" in place of "1919" at that point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What page is that?

Mr. WARREN. Page 49, line 13.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What is the amendment proposed to the House text?

Mr. WARREN. To erase "1919" and put in "1918."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 49, line 13, it is proposed to strike out "1919" and to insert in lieu thereof "1918."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee why this deficiency was not discovered prior to this time, so that in the last deficiency appropriation bill it could have been added?

Mr. WARREN. There was a long document here on the subject; but oftentimes things of that kind occur. In fact, I presume this bill has some matters in it relating to the year 1916. The adjudication of the accounts sometimes develops something of this nature at a later time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, during the reading of the bill I invited the attention of the chairman of the committee to a provision found on page 9, containing an appropriation of $4,000 for the District of Columbia. I should like to ask the chairman or some member of the committee to make an explanation respecting that item.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, when the deficiency bill was up before, the District Commissioners asked for an item of $7,500 to cover that deficiency. That bill failed to pass, and the commissioners reduced expenses as far as they could; but they now have an actual deficiency of $4,000, and they have simply asked for the actual amount needed to meet that deficiency. I might state to the Senator that in order to meet the expenses they have taken $4,000 out of the street and walks fund, which I think they had a right to do; but, of course, it should be replaced, and I hope the Senator will not object to the item.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator whether or not any instructions have been given or any measure has been recommended to curtail, if not the extravagance of the officials of the city, at least their predilection to exceed the amounts appropriated and their predilection to come in and secure additional appropriations?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator asked that question. The District Commissioners are not the only ones who are guilty of filing estimates far below the amount required for the year, and coming in at the end of the year with large deficiency estimates. I hope the chairman of the committee will serve notice upon the heads of the various departments that they must put in the original estimates what they need and that the next time a deficiency bill comes up, unless they have asked for what they really need in the regular estimates, their request for a deficiency appropriation will be disallowed. I am going to ask the chairman either to give that notice or to indorse what I have said on the subject. I have charge of two bills, and the departments which send in the estimates for those two bills are going to be notified by me that they must send in for the regular appropriation bills estimates of the amounts they will actually need.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit an inquiry? Is it not the fact, however, that they do send in what they conceive to be required for the operation of their bureau or department for the year, but they become lax and extravagant and, by reason of their extravagance and their laxity and the failure to observe the proper methods and the proper administration and executive methods, exceed the amount which has been appropriated?

Mr. CURTIS. My experience on the Appropriations Committee leads me to believe that the statement by the Senator is partly true; but they go further. I think some of the heads estimate for less amounts than they know they will need, because they want to cut down in the original appropriation bill the amount given to their department to make a good showing, knowing that the last two or three months of the fiscal year they can come in with a deficit and show that there is really that much needed and that there will be an appropriation made to cover it. I think that is an additional reason for sending in an estimate for an amount less than they know will really be needed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further amendments, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

TELEGRAPH AND TELEPHONE CONTROL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 120) to repeal chapter 154 of the act of the second session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, being the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution to authorize the President in time of war to supervise or take possession and assume control of any telegraph, telephone, marine cable or radio system or systems, or any part thereof, and to operate the same in such manner as may be needful or desirable for the duration of the war, and to provide just compensation therefor," approved July 16, 1918.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. CURTIS. Will the Senator from Iowa yield to me a moment, that I may ask to have read a telegram explaining the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa on behalf of the committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

TOPEKA, KANS., June 9, 1919.

Hon. CHARLES CURTIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Owing to the crisis existing in affairs of telephone companies throughout the Nation, resulting principally from increase in wage scales, this commission favors the immediate return of wire systems to their owners and that local exchange rates inaugurated by the Government continue the legal rates for a period of at least 90 days, thereby giving State commissions time to investigate and authorize fair rates for said service, which by reason of its character is purely intrastate service.

JOHN M. KINKEL, Chairman.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I merely desire to finish in a very brief way the suggestion I was making last night when the bill was temporarily laid aside.

I explained as fully as I thought necessary the purposes and the effect of the bill now before the Senate, together with the amendment which has been proposed by the committee. I think it is due to the Postmaster General to incorporate in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a letter which I received from him on the day following the order, which the newspapers of the country construed as an order releasing the wire systems from Federal control. I do not criticize the newspapers, because I think their mistake was due largely to a heading put upon the announcement in the office of the Postmaster General; but I have this letter from him upon this subject, and I read it because I think it is desirable to remove a false impression which may exist throughout the country upon the subject. The letter is addressed to me and reads as follows:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., June 6, 1919.

Hon. ALBERT B. CUMMINS,
Chairman Committee on Interstate Commerce,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: An order issued by me yesterday relative to the operation of the telegraph and telephone systems has been construed by some as actual return of the properties to the owners. No such action has been taken by me, nor is any contemplated. This order simply dissolves the operating board appointed by me under date of December 13, 1918, and directs that the systems be again operated by the regular operating officials under Government supervision. Responsibility of the Government to these systems in no wise ceases. It being evident that these properties are to be returned in the very near future, it was necessary for the Postmaster General to take steps immediately to set up the regular operating organization of the companies so that when the properties are turned back it can be done without confusion or interruption to the service, which was the purpose of the order. This order in no wise affects the legislation pending before your committee or before the Congress. It will enable the companies to begin steps immediately to prepare the data and collect their information to be submitted to the State commissions for the rate cases, which will probably be taken up immediately after the period of Government control ends.

I am attaching copies of the order and statement made by me at the time same was issued.

Sincerely, yours, A. S. BURLESON.

I read this simply to indicate that there was no purpose on the part of the Postmaster General to anticipate or prevent the legislation which was pending before our committee and before Congress.

In addressing myself to the subject yesterday I referred to the order of December 13, 1918, Bulletin No. 22, which increased the toll charges in the companies throughout the country, and I also referred to a statement that had been furnished to me by the Postmaster General giving the names of the several companies whose exchange rates had been either increased or approved by the Postmaster General. I thought I requested that these papers should be printed as a part of my remarks yesterday, but I find that I omitted it, and I now ask that the statements and order be printed as a part of my observations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Original order.]

TELEGRAPH AND TELEPHONE SERVICE—BULLETIN NO. 22.

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
ORDER NO. 2495. Washington, December 13, 1918.

There are many counties and districts in which a free toll service is granted the subscriber within such county or district, the exchange rates presumably having been made with a view to such free toll service. This order shall not be construed as requiring a discontinuance of these privileges pending a study and revision of these exchange rates.

Nothing in this order establishing toll rates shall be construed as changing rates made without reference to mileage now established for service within a certain county or other area when such rates are not in excess of 10 cents, but no further rates of this character shall be established without specific approval of the Postmaster General.

In competitive situations where the earning value of a property under Federal control would be unfavorably affected by the establishment of rates and charges herein ordered, an exception may be made by filing with the Postmaster General a statement to that effect with a proposal of modification from ordered rates and such modifications may go into effect unless vetoed or otherwise ordered by the Postmaster General within 30 days, and during such 30 days existing rates may be continued.

I. CLASSIFICATION OF TOLL TELEPHONE SERVICE.

The following classes of telephone toll message service shall be established effective at 12.01 a. m., January 21, 1919.

1. Station-to-station messages.—This service shall be defined by the following conditions:

(a) Orders for station-to-station service shall specify the telephone station called, either by telephone number or by the name of the subscriber of the called station.

(b) Under this classification orders will not be accepted to establish communication between particular persons.

(c) The measurement of the duration of a station-to-station message for purposes of the application of rates shall begin at the moment when telephonic communication is established between the called and the calling stations. The term "station" for the purpose of this clause is defined to include a private branch exchange switchboard operator, in those cases where private branch exchange systems are involved in station-to-station service.

(d) Station-to-station service may be operated as a number service, in which case the called station may be designated only by number, through A and B switchboards or through tandem operators, etc.; or it may be operated through toll switchboards, and technically known as an "AY" service, depending on the local circumstances as to operating conditions, plant conditions, and the circumstances as to directory distribution and areas; and the more economical method will be employed in each case. The choice of method of operating station-to-station service will be determined solely as an operating arrangement, not in any way affecting rates or service, except that where the number method is employed it is required that orders be accepted stating only the telephone number of the called station.

(e) The charges for station-to-station messages shall not be "reversed," i. e., collected at the called station.

2. Person-to-person calls: This service shall be defined by the following conditions:

(a) Orders will be accepted to establish communication between specified persons.

(b) The measurement of the duration of a person-to-person message for the purpose of the application of rates shall begin at the moment when communication begins with or between the particular person or persons specified in the order; provided that certain report charges will be made under the conditions specified in the clause next below, where communication may not be established.

(c) Orders for person-to-person service are accepted only under the condition that a limited charge (to be known as "Report charge") will be made in the following cases where it is impossible to establish communication between particular persons:

(1) When the order is to establish communication with a particular person in a given city, telephone address unknown, and the particular person can not be secured within one hour (exclusive of any time during which "no circuits" or other cause prevent communication of the order to the distant city or exchange or its completion).

(2) When the designated person called refuses to talk.

(3) When the report is returned that the designated person called is "out" or "out and will return at (specified time)" or "out and time of return unknown," "is absent from the city," and similar reports advising the calling subscriber of the facts ascertained when failure to complete the order is due solely to the circumstances of the called person or to fault in describing the location of the called person, and when all of the work preliminary to establishing communication with the called person is done.

(4) When communication between the designated persons can not be established because the designated person at the calling station is absent at the calling station; provided that no charge shall be made in such cases where the delay, if any, in establishing connection is greater than one hour.

(5) When the designated person at the calling station refuses to talk when the facilities for communication have been established.

3. Appointment calls: Appointment calls are person-to-person calls, the order for which provides that communication is to be arranged for to take place at a specified time.

4. Messenger calls: Messenger calls are person-to-person calls requiring the use of a messenger to secure attendance of a designated person at one of the public pay stations at the distant point.

5. Collect calls: Collect calls are person-to-person calls, the charges for which are "reversed," i. e., to be collected from the subscriber of the distant station at which the call is to be completed.

II. STANDARD TOLL RATES FOR STATION-TO-STATION MESSAGES.

Effective 12.01 a. m., January 21, 1919, the following initial period rates are made standard throughout the United States for station-to-station toll messages where the distance between the exchanges or toll points does not exceed 40 miles by direct air-line measurement:

For distances more than—	But not more than—	Initial rate is—
0 miles	6 miles	$0.05
6 "	12 "	.10
12 "	18 "	.15
18 "	24 "	.20
32 "	40 "	.30

The following initial period rates are made standard for station-to-station toll messages for all distances in excess of 40 miles by direct air-line measurement:

For each additional 8 miles or fraction thereof, 5 cents additional.

For the purpose of applying standard rates where the direct air line distance between points is in excess of 40 miles, distance shall be determined as the air line distance between the centers of blocks 7 miles square, within which the points of communication are located, and where the distance is in excess of 350 miles by the air line distance between centers of sections 35 miles square.

The block and section scaling system for purposes of measuring toll rate distance between points more than 40 miles distant by direct measurement, shall consist of a grid containing sections 35 miles square, each section subdivided into 25 blocks 7 miles square, so placed on a polyconic projection of a Government survey map of the United States that section lines coincide with a line drawn approximately north and south through the center of the United States and with a line at right angles thereto passing through the northwestern point of the international boundary line in the Strait of Georgia.

III. STANDARD TOLL RATES FOR OTHER CLASSES OF TOLL CALLS.

Effective 12.01 a. m., January 21, 1919, the following toll message rates are established for person-to-person calls, appointment calls, and messenger calls:

1. The initial period rates for person-to-person calls shall be approximately 25 per cent in addition to the station-to-station rates between the same points in accordance with the schedule of computed rates for person to person, appointment, and messenger toll calls attached hereto and hereby made a part of this order; but no person-to-person rate shall be less than 20 cents.

2. In those cases where person-to-person calls are not completed and a report is made or the conditions are such as described in paragraph I, 2 (c), of this order, a report charge shall be made of approximately one-fourth the initial rate for station-to-station messages between the same points in accordance with the schedule of computed rates for person to person, appointment, and messenger toll calls attached hereto and hereby made a part of this order; but no report charge shall be less than 10 cents for any one call nor more than $2.

3. The rates for appointment calls shall be approximately 50 per cent in addition to the rates for station-to-station messages between the same points in accordance with the schedule of computed rates for person to person, appointment, and messenger toll call hereto attached and hereby made a part of this order; but in the case of any appointment call order, where the distant station is reached, whether the appointment be made or not, the report charge applicable in case of person-to-person calls between the same points shall be made. No appointment calls shall be accepted where the station-to-station rate is less than 15 cents.

4. The rates for messenger calls shall be the same as applied to appointment calls between the same points, plus any charges that may be required for the service of messengers. No messenger calls shall be accepted where the station-to-station rate is less than 15 cents.

IV. STANDARD TOLL NIGHT RATES.

Effective 12.01 a. m., January 21, 1919, the following reductions shall be made in the rates and charges for station-to-station messages only between the hours of 8.30 p. m. and 4.30 a. m.

1. Between the hours of 8.30 p. m. and 12 midnight the night rates for station-to-station messages shall be approximately 50 per cent less than the regular day rates in accordance with the schedule of computed night rates attached hereto and hereby made a part of this order, but no night rate shall be less than 25 cents.

2. Between the hours of 12 midnight and 4.30 a. m. the night rates shall be approximately 75 per cent less than the established day rates in accordance with the schedule of computed night rates attached hereto and hereby made a part of this order, but no night rate shall be less than 25 cents.

3. For the purpose of applying night rates, the time of day at the point at which a station-to-station message originates shall be used.

4. Day rates only shall be employed between the hours of 4.30 a. m. and 8.30 p. m.

V. STANDARD INITIAL PERIODS, OVERTIME PERIODS, AND OVERTIME RATES.

Effective 12.01 a. m., January 21, 1919, the following initial periods, overtime periods, and overtime rates are made standard in connection with all toll calls and messages made at standard initial toll rates:

Mr. CUMMINS. I need say nothing further than that. The amendment which is now pending is an amendment which proposes to continue in force the rate increases promulgated by the Postmaster General for a period of 90 days after the passage of the act, and I again add my judgment is that it is but fair to the telegraph companies and fair to the public.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. Before the Senator from Iowa takes his seat I should like to ask him a question with respect to the language of the bill. It is to be noticed that by the first section chapter 154 is expressly repealed. In a subsequent section, section 3, it is provided—

> That the first proviso of said joint resolution prescribing the just compensation to be paid for and on account of said acts shall continue in full force and effect until such just compensation shall be fully paid and adjusted to and with the owners of said systems, lines, and property, in the manner and according to the terms and conditions therein set forth.

I wondered if the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] had given thought to that apparent incongruity in the language of the bill repealing the entire chapter, and then in a subsequent section reenacting the proviso and declaring that it shall remain in force.

Mr. CUMMINS. Before the Senator from Minnesota answers, permit me to express my own opinion about it. I do not think that the reservation to which the Senator from Arkansas has referred is really needed in the bill. I think the right of the telephone companies to claim and to obtain just compensation for the use of their properties while under Federal control is necessarily reserved.

Mr. ROBINSON. I agree with the Senator. I do not think Congress could take it away from them even if it attempted to do so.

Mr. CUMMINS. It could not do so without violating the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. ROBINSON. It occurred to me that to repeal the entire chapter and then provide that a proviso, without reenacting the language of it, should remain in effect is a doubtful procedure.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Minnesota will speak for himself in a moment, but I assume it was intended to give reassurance to the owners of these companies that there was no thought or purpose of taking away from them their right to just compensation for the use of their property.

Mr. ROBINSON. Of course Congress could not do that even if it attempted to do it, but it might, by repealing the language, modify the manner in which the compensation should be arrived at. I simply call the attention of the Senator to it.

Mr. CUMMINS. If I may be permitted, I will conclude my remarks upon the subject and yield the floor, hoping that we may secure a vote on the amendment soon, and give the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] an opportunity to answer the question which has been propounded by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. KING. Before the Senator from Iowa takes his seat, I should like to ask a few questions.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. During the hearings on the bill offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] was it disclosed what, if any, reason existed for taking over the telegraph and telephone systems at any time or at the time when they were taken over?

Mr. CUMMINS. That question was asked more than one of the witnesses, and there were many who appeared before the committee. There was no witness able to answer it. There was no witness able to assign any reason whatsoever for the taking over of these properties. But I regard that as a question that is long past, and I did not debate it because I do not think it is material.

Mr. KING. I concede, of course, if the Senator will pardon me a moment, that it is not material to the passage of this bill, and perhaps is not pertinent, and yet believing, as I always have believed, that there was no necessity whatever for taking over the telegraph and telephone systems, and that it was a mistake to do it, I was rather curious to ascertain whether there was any justification before the committee for the action of the executive department.

Mr. CUMMINS. I thought it was a mistake at the time and I still think it was a mistake. I have never been able to discover any reason whatever for taking over either the telegraph or the telephone systems of the country, whatever may be said with regard to the cable.

Mr. KING. Another question, if the Senator will permit me: Was there any evidence showing that any effort had been made to adjust the claims, if the claims had been preferred, of the telegraph and telephone systems for damages resulting from the taking over?

Mr. CUMMINS. There has been a continuous effort. The Postmaster General has entered into contracts with, I think, about 35 companies, which fixed the compensation those companies are to receive for the use of their properties. The remainder of the companies are entirely at sea. There has been no adjustment or arrangement with regard to their compensation, and they will be compelled, I assume, to seek compensation in the manner provided for in the original resolution.

Mr. KING. One further question. Was there any evidence which would enable the committee to determine with any degree of accuracy the amount of loss that the Government will sustain by reason of having taken over the telegraph and telephone systems?

Mr. CUMMINS. There was some evidence upon that point, but I do not recall the aggregate amount. Representatives of several companies stated the amount the Government would lose under the contract which had been made with their companies.

Mr. KELLOGG. If the Senator will permit me, I can give the figures.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. The loss of the Government to the American Telegraph & Telephone Co. was estimated to be about $9,000,000.

Mr. KING. That is the operating expense?

Mr. KELLOGG. The Government's loss will be $9,000,000. That is, the Government has agreed to pay to the American Telegraph & Telephone Co. as compensation a sum exceeding the income by $9,000,000. So the Government's loss is $9,000,000. For the 35 companies which have made contracts with the Postmaster General the loss is estimated at about $600,000. The balance of the companies have no contracts, and there is no way of telling what the Government's loss will be. They have claims against the Government for compensation, but they have not been adjusted.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, when the Senator speaks of losses which the Government sustained, the Senator does not include within the term "losses" claims for damages which the respective companies will assert against us for having dispossessed them of their property?

Mr. KELLOGG. The American Telegraph & Telephone Co. probably has no claim for damages, because it entered into a contract with the Government similar to the railroad contract, whereby the Government agreed to pay the American Telegraph & Telephone Co. a sum as compensation for the use of the wires. The 35 companies which have made contracts with the Government are in the same position. The other 10,000 to 50,000 companies taken over by the Government have made no adjustment, and we have no knowledge as to what their claims for damages will be.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit me to ask the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Iowa, whether there was anything before the committee to indicate that any superior service had been rendered by reason of the Government having taken possession of the systems or, upon the contrary, did the evidence tend to show a deterioration in the service and a lack of morale upon the part of the employees?

Mr. CUMMINS. It is quite safe to say that all the representatives of the companies who were before the committee asserted that the service rendered before the Government took possession was quite as good as the service rendered afterwards. I do not think, however, that any witness put particular emphasis upon any deterioration in the service, although some of them spoke about the disorganization which necessarily occurs in a transition of that character.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may refer to the question asked by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] a moment ago, I agree with him, legally speaking, that there was no necessity for making the reservation in the pending bill with regard to compensation. I believe, however, it was wise to insert it, because it would relieve the minds of some who might not be familiar with the legal liability of the Government.

I desire to say just a word with reference to the history of the joint resolution approved July 16, 1918, under which the Government assumed control of the wire systems of the country. At the time the joint resolution was presented the majority of the committee were first of the opinion that there ought to be full hearings. Later, when it was called to the attention of the committee that we were not taking over the wires but simply authorizing the President to take them over when it might seem to be desirable in his judgment, it was decided not to have hearings of any length, and the only witness who appeared before us was one of the officials of the Western Union Telegraph Co.

It was claimed on the outside that there was a certain present necessity in that there were rumors that there were going to be certain labor troubles. I think I am in entire accord with the facts when I say that the threatened labor troubles were inconsequential.

We were approaching the close of the session and it was thought there might be a military necessity for the taking over of these wires, possibly during the recess of Congress. I was satisfied at the time that there was no necessity whatsoever for the taking over of any of the wire systems; and, if I am properly informed, I do not believe that during the prosecution of the war any necessity developed. I do know that originally it was thought that there might be a reason for the taking over of the telegraph wires. It was said that there might possibly be a necessity for taking over the telephone trunk lines, but not the local companies. I think a very great mistake was made when it was attempted to take over these wire systems, and particularly the telephone systems. I think no good came of it, and much harm.

There were from 40,000 to 50,000 of these smaller telephone companies. There is no evidence whatsoever that the Government was not just as well served prior to the taking over of the wires as they were served after they were taken over, and it has served to some extent, I think, to destroy the morale of the companies. But that, perhaps, is past history.

The President has suggested the turning back of these wires. I understand that the Postmaster General concurs in that suggestion. I think it is wise that they be turned back, and the more quickly they can be turned back the better for all parties concerned. The only matter that gave us very much concern, and I perhaps am expressing my own view rather than that of the members of the committee, was as to what should be done with respect to a continuation of the rates which had been prescribed by the Federal Government. They were increased generally speaking about 20 per cent. It appeared in the testimony before the committee on the part of the Postal Telegraph Co. that if their wires were turned back they would immediately reduce their rates to those of the prewar period. That being so, I felt that there was no particular reason why the Western Union Telegraph Co. could not decrease its rates in the same way, because they are conducting the largest part of the telegraph business.

But when it came to the telephone systems we were confronted with a different question. There were probably forty or fifty thousand of these local companies. Many of them were organized not for purposes of profit but as local companies for the convenience of the subscribers. They did not care whether they made any money out of their system or not. What they wanted was the service. In nearly all, if not all, of the States there are local bodies that can fix the rates, either in the form of public utilities commissions controlled by the State or by municipal bodies or by contracts between the companies and the subscribers. Of course it would take some little time to adjust these rates. Necessarily the committee could not fix a rate or suggest a rate that could apply to all of the various companies in the 48 States, and so it was thought wise that the present Government rates, wherever they have been announced, should be continued for a period of 90 days unless the State, municipal, or other local authorities should change the rates at an earlier date. In my judgment, in every State there will be plenty of time to change these rates if they are not right, within the 90 days.

Further than that, it seemed to us that there was a good deal of doubt as to whether or not if we said nothing upon this subject in the pending legislation the present Government rates would continue. That is a legal proposition fraught with a good deal of difficulty, and we thought, looking at it from the financial standpoint of the companies, it would be better to render certain a thing which was uncertain. It appeared before our committee that in most of the States there would not be very much difficulty, it was thought, in the changing of the rates to make them reasonable if they are not reasonable.

I have before me a letter from the Bell Telephone Co., called the American Telegraph & Telephone Co., and the United States Independent Telephone Association, suggesting a period of one year; but my guess is that if these rates were continued for a year they would take a year to adjust them, and if we gave them two years they would probably take two years.

They know what their property accounts are, they know what their increased expenses are, and certainly they will have no difficulty in going before the proper State or local authorities and naming a schedule of rates. This can be adopted temporarily by these different organizations if they are not quite certain as to exactly what they should be, and later on they can take further testimony if necessary. I feel that the committee has been very reasonable in fixing a 90-day period within which they can adjust the question of rates.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I desire to address a question to the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. Can the Senator tell me about claims for damages accruing during the period of Government ownership? Will the companies be in a position to plead that they were Government agencies and therefore secure immunity from suits?

Mr. CUMMINS. Unfortunately, Mr. President, the original act made no provision for bringing suit against the Government. The committee believed that it was not wise to enter upon that subject at this time. Personally my opinion is that if all the systems were under Federal control or in the possession of the Government no suit would lie against the companies which theretofore had operated them, and that any suit arising out of the operation by the Government would be brought against the Government, and under our law it would necessarily be brought in the Court of Claims.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have an amendment prepared prohibiting the companies from pleading in suits for damages the fact that they had been Government agencies, but if the chairman of the committee does not think it wise to go into this matter at present I shall not press the amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think there is a general law which confers jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims in such cases.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield for a moment? The chairman of the committee is familiar with the last proviso of the act approved July 16, 1918, which reads as follows:

Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to amend, repeal, impair, or affect existing laws or powers of the States in relation to taxation or the lawful police regulations of the several States, except wherein such laws, powers, or regulations may affect the transmission of Government communications, or the issue of stocks and bonds by such system or systems.

I do not know what the effect of that provision is, but it was evidently intended to preserve these rights.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think it was intended really to preserve in the States the power or authority of regulation over such rates. But the Supreme Court of the United States, as you will remember, a week ago yesterday declared that notwithstanding that provision in the law the Postmaster General had the full and complete authority to make rates, not only interstate rates but State rates as well.

I am inclined to think that would not cover the case of a suit, and anyone who has suffered damage of that kind will have to seek his remedy against the United States precisely as every other citizen seeks a remedy when the Government has wronged him.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Was this matter brought before the committee during its hearings?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not remember that it was; I can not recall, but I am inclined to think it was not.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Is it the opinion of the Senator that it is not within the power of Congress to provide that these companies may be made responsible in damages by suits of the character indicated?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think you can make the companies which formerly operated the properties responsible for torts committed by the Government; but it is possible to provide—this is a first impression—that suits may be brought against these companies in the various jurisdictions, and that any sums paid out by reason of damages recovered could be reckoned as a part of the cost of operation, and in that way the Government be made responsible for the damages.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I desire to say that it seems clear that after the Government took possession of this property any resulting damages growing out of the possession of the property lie against the Government and not against the owners of the property. If the Government were to take the Senator's automobile for a war emergency, and the man who was driving the car ran over somebody and injured him, the Senator would not be liable because it was his car, but the Government would be liable because it was its act. Of course, those causes that arose before the Government took possession still exist against these companies—there is no question about that—but as to anything that arose during Government control and operation these companies have nothing to do with.

Mr. SHEPPARD. But suppose it is provided that any judgment shall be charged to the operating expenses of the systems during the period of Government control and shall be taken out of the receipts during governmental control?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But you can not divorce the Government from the right, as it ultimately has to pay. Of course, that would only be making the Government pay because the Government gets the receipts and then pays its lease for the system. If you did that, you might take away the right of the Government to defend itself, and you might have actions lying against the Government that were unjust.

Besides that, I doubt very much whether a clause of that kind would be constitutional. Even if we pass the bill making these companies liable for the unlawful acts of the Government during its operation, and judgment was rendered, would that not be taking private property without due compensation? It would be making an individual pay for an act which the Government or somebody else committed. It seems to me that clearly it is within the scope of the constitutional inhibition against taking private property without just compensation; and even if we put a clause of that kind into the bill, I do not believe it would pass the courts.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Alabama will not misunderstand me. In the way he has just stated it, it would undoubtedly be unconstitutional; but when the Government comes to pay the compensation due to these various companies during Federal control it must, if it adopts the plan of net income, allow them damages, for they are part of the operating expenses. If a private citizen recovers from a company for damages during that period and it is permitted to charge the judgment into operating expenses, the Government would have to pay it only once, and it would be entirely fair, althought it is open to the objection that the Senator has suggested in regard to the Government having an opportunity to defend. It would have no opportunity to defend against a claim of that kind.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It seems to me that as to damages for wrong done to individuals during Government control, if there is a just case against the Government during that time, the individual citizen ought to have his opportunity. I am rather inclined to think that the general statutes in reference to the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims are broad enough to cover cases of that kind now; but possibly they are not. If they are not, the jurisdiction ought to be broadened in the Court of Claims, so that the citizen who is injured by the Government during the period of control might have his day in court. It seems to me that is the only place a case would lie.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Does the Senator not realize that it would be a great hardship to have citizens of this country go into the Court of Claims to press their various suits for damages?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Most of those cases would fall within the jurisdiction of district courts. The district courts have concurrent jurisdiction with the Court of Claims up to $10,000, and where the case involved not more than $10,000 I do not know that any great hardship would be incurred.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to suggest to the Senator from Texas that, in my judgment, Congress will be compelled to pass subsequent legislation with regard to adjusting the claims of these companies against the Government for use during Federal control. I do not believe it is possible either to make contracts with respect to all of them, nor do I think it is fair to require all of them to come to Washington to sue in the Court of Claims. I think the Senator will have abundant opportunity to present the views that he has just stated at a subsequent time. I think that time will surely come.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, for the information of the Senate I shall ask that the amendment which I had in mind be read in order that it may be incorporated in the RECORD. I trust opportunity will offer hereafter for the consideration of the question I have presented.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add after the last proviso in section 1 the following:

And provided further, That actions on claims for loss and damage on account of the acts or omissions of the agents and employees engaged in the operation of such systems accruing during the period of control of the same under the joint resolution approved July 16, 1918, may be maintained in courts of competent jurisdiction, and in any such action no defense shall be made thereto that any such telegraph, telephone, marine cable, or radio system or systems was an instrumentality or agency of the Federal Government, and any judgment therein rendered shall be charged to the operating expenses of such systems during such period of governmental control, and compensation made therefor as provided in such joint resolution: Provided, That no process, mesne or final, shall be levied against the property of any such system or systems to satisfy any such judgment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the substitute amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CUMMINS. The vote just taken was upon the committee amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was upon the committee amendment.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I rise to occupy the attention of the Senate for a few moments only. The main fact to which I desire to call attention is the futility of Government operation, as evidenced by our recent experience. Those of us who prophesied evil, weakness, inefficiency, and incompetency when these lines were taken over have had our prophecies fulfilled, not because of those who took them over or those who have operated them, but because of the inevitable weakness of any system of Government operation or Government ownership.

The President in his letter recently published made this statement:

The telegraph and telephone lines will, of course, be returned to their owners as soon as the retransfer can be effected without administrative confusion.

Why "of course"? That was not the intention when they were taken over, because when the legislation was enacted by virtue of which they were taken over there was no intention, either implied or expressed, that they should ever be returned to their owners. The President uses the term "of course" because of the conditions that have resulted by reason of Government operation. "Of course" because of incompetency; "of course" because of inefficiency; "of course" because of increased cost; "of course" because of inadequate revenue; "of course" because of general discontent on the part of those who use these systems throughout the country; "of course" because of a nation-wide strike; "of course" because of utter demoralization from one end of the land to the other; "of course" they are to be returned to their owners and their managers.

When these lines were taken over there was no justification for taking them, but at that time it was the expressed intention of those who testified to retain control for all future time. Mr. Burleson, the Postmaster General, testified before the House committee in this fashion:

Mr. ESCH. And do you agree with the other Secretaries that this resolution is primarily a war necessity?

Postmaster General BURLESON. Undoubtedly the necessity for action now grows out of the exigencies of the war; but if the same efficient management and direction is given the telegraph and telephone that has been given the Postal Service, the probability is that they never will be returned to private control.

I may say, in passing, that the great trouble about the telegraph and telephone service is that the same kind of management has been given to them that has characterized the management of the Post Office Department; but that is only aside from the purpose of my argument. Mr. Burleson makes the statement:

If the same efficient management and direction is given the telegraph and telephone that has been given the Postal Service, the probability is that they never will be returned to private control.

Then he adds this significant statement:

But if Government control was a failure they would undoubtedly be returned.

Mr. President, they are being returned, and therefore the statement justifies and explains itself, for if Government operation had been a success, according to his own language, the lines would have been permanently operated by the Government; but, inasmuch as Government operation has been a failure, according to his own language, they are because of that fact to be returned to their private owners. I think it quite important at this time that that admission should be called to the attention of the country.

At the time when the lines were taken over there were but three witnesses examined before the House committee—Postmaster General Burleson, Secretary Baker, and Secretary Daniels. At that time Mr. Baker said:

If I had my way about it there would not be any limitation of time put in. That is the position I would have taken on the subject of railroad legislation.

Thereby expressing his belief not only in Government operation but in Government ownership.

And Secretary Daniels said:

If you wish my view, I would say it ought to last forever.

So that the only three persons who testified before the House committee when these lines were about to be taken over were three members of the President's Cabinet, all of whom gave testimony to the effect that they believed in Government operation and Government ownership, leaving the irresistible inference that the lines which were to be turned over by virtue of the act then under consideration would be retained for the purpose of Government operation.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana if he thinks that these three members of the Cabinet, after the experience we have had, are of the same opinion still?

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, unfortunately I am not in intimate contact and have no intimate relationship with the members of the Cabinet, but I infer from the language used by the Postmaster General that he is more than satisfied with his experience, and that he is quite willing at this time to turn these lines back to their owners, because he said:

But if Government control was a failure, they would undoubtedly be returned.

Inasmuch as they are being returned, we are left to the conclusion inevitably that the Postmaster General regards his administration as a failure, and in that I think the entire country is willing to concur.

Mr. President, the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], whom I do not now see in his seat, asked various questions as to the justification for taking over the lines at that time. I will read from the testimony of Mr. Reynolds, which is very brief, on that point. Mr. Reynolds, who is the general manager of the Postal Telegraph Co., testified as follows:

Senator KELLOGG. So far as the telegraph lines are concerned, do you know of any war necessity at all for taking them over?

Mr. REYNOLDS. There was no emergency at that time that justified taking them over for the national security.

Senator POINDEXTER. What date were they taken over?

Mr. REYNOLDS. August 1, 1918.

Senator KELLOGG. Has there ever been any necessity for taking them over?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Not to my knowledge.

Senator KELLOGG. You are familiar with their operations?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Yes; I am familiar with the operations of the Postal Telegraph Co.; and there was nothing, as far as I know, to justify taking over the lines.

Senator KELLOGG. They have been operated since by the same employees?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Exactly.

Senator KELLOGG. And the cables are the same?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Yes.

Senator POINDEXTER. At what time were the cables taken over?

Mr. REYNOLDS. On November 16—five days after the signing of the armistice—on an order dated November 2, which had not been announced.

But that is aside from the purpose of these remarks.

Mr. Carlton, the manager of the Western Union, had this to say as to the justification for the lines being taken over:

Senator TOWNSEND. Has the Government adopted any policy for enlarging the plant, different from what you had?

Mr. CARLTON. No, sir.

Senator TOWNSEND. Has it attempted any other policy?

Mr. CARLTON. No, sir; not that I know of.

Senator TOWNSEND. Have the wires served the interests of the country as a war property better than they were serving it prior to the taking over?

Mr. CARLTON. Well, I was mystified when I appeared before this committee a year ago as to why the wires were taken over; to-day I am in the same fog of mystery.

Senator TOWNSEND. Was it urged upon you at the time that the Government could use these lines for war purposes better than you were using them?

Mr. CARLTON. No; because they were used after the Postmaster General took them over precisely as they were used before.

Senator TOWNSEND. Do you know whether it was the Postmaster General's purpose in taking these lines over to serve the country better as a war agency?

Mr. CARLTON. I have not the remotest idea.

Senator TOWNSEND. Has he ever expressed that to you?

Mr. CARLTON. No; he never has, and I have always been very careful not to ask him.

Senator TOWNSEND. In your opinion, were the lines taken over as a war emergency or as a peace proposition, with the idea of reorganizing them differently from what they were organized?

Mr. CARLTON. Well, you ask my opinion?

Senator TOWNSEND. Yes.

Mr. CARLTON. My opinion is that an opportunity was seized to take over the wire companies in order to carry out a program of Government ownership.

So it is exceedingly gratifying to those of us who have always opposed the policy of Government ownership to know that it has been a failure in this regard. I do not mean, Senators, that I am glad to have any part of our Government activities fail, because, as one who upholds the Government, I am glad to see whatever the Government undertakes or any policy upon which it embarks a success; but inasmuch as there was no justification for taking these lines over, save that they should be seized to carry out a prearranged policy and in order to give Mr. Burleson an opportunity to exploit his ideas of Government ownership, I have no regret to express at the failure which has resulted.

I am very glad that the telegraph and telephone lines are to be turned back to their owners, and I believe that the measure which we are about to pass is the very best that can be enacted under existing circumstances and under present conditions. I trust that out of it all will come a lesson to the American people that we should not at any time undertake the operation, much less the ownership, of these public utilities by the Government. If we learn that lesson, so that the next generation can not be induced to touch this question, I think the great cost it has occasioned will not have been expended in vain.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, on the second day of the present session, feeling, as I did, that the telegraph and telephone systems should be restored to their owners, I introduced a joint resolution, which was referred to the appropriate committee, asking for the repeal of the existing law. I am very much pleased that the chairman of the committee and the committee have acted with such promptitude in reporting the bill offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]. I shall be doubly gratified when this bill is enacted into law and these instrumentalities are returned to their owners. I ask that the joint resolution which I then introduced, and to which I have just referred, be printed as a part of my remarks. I do not ask that it be read.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 9) relating to the transfer of control of the telegraph, telephone, marine cable, and radio systems was ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas pursuant to a joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution to authorize the President, in time of war, to supervise or take possession and assume control of any telegraph, telephone, marine cable, or radio system or systems, or any part thereof, and to operate the same in such manner as may be needful or desirable for the duration of the war, and to provide just compensation therefor," approved July 16, 1918, the President of the United States, by proclamation dated July 22, 1918, took possession and assumed control and supervision of each and every telegraph and telephone system, and every part thereof, within the jurisdiction of the United States, including all equipment thereof and appurtenances thereto, and all materials and supplies; and also by said proclamation directed that said supervision, possession, control, and operation of said telegraph and telephone systems should be exercised by and through the Postmaster General of the United States; and

Whereas whatever reasons called for the passage of said resolution and for said action taken thereunder by said President of the United States no longer exist: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the authority conferred by said resolution be, and the same is hereby, revoked and withdrawn and said resolution is hereby repealed.

SEC. 2. That the Postmaster General of the United States be, and he is hereby, directed to relinquish the supervision, possession, and control of each and every telegraph and telephone system, together with all appurtenances thereto and all materials connected therewith, so taken over, under and by virtue of said resolution and said proclamation issued pursuant thereto, and to restore the same forthwith to the owners and holders thereof: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to impair or in anywise abridge the right of the owner or owners of any of said systems or property affected by said proclamation to recover just compensation for any and all damages and injuries sustained by reason of said supervision, possession, control, or operation upon the part of the President of the United States and the Postmaster General.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CUMMINS, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill to repeal the joint resolution entitled 'Joint resolution to authorize the President in time of war to supervise or take possession and assume control of any telegraph, telephone, marine cable, or radio system or systems or any part thereof, and to operate the same in such manner as may be needful or desirable for the duration of the war and to provide just compensation therefor,' approved July 16, 1918, and for other purposes."

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. CUMMINS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 6, being Senate bill 641.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 641) to amend section 10 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918, which had been reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce with amendments.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the purpose of this bill is to restore to the Interstate Commerce Commission its full and complete authority over the railway rate structure of the United States. I think most of the Members of the Senate who are here now were here at the last session when I explained it at some length, and I do not want to take up the time of Senators to do a useless thing; but I may remark that when we passed the act of March 21, 1918, prescribing the compensation which should be paid to the railways, we adopted a rather comprehensive code for Federal control. I say of the pending bill, as I did about the bill that has just passed, that I have no desire to enter into a controversy with regard to the wisdom of the legislation which we then passed. While I was fully in sympathy with the desire and purpose of the administration in taking over the railways for Government operation during the war, there were many parts of that bill which prescribed the terms of control to which I was very much opposed, and this was one of those parts. I believed then that it was not necessary to withdraw from the Interstate Commerce Commission its jurisdiction over the rates which would govern the transportation of traffic; but the Senate and the Congress decided otherwise, and I have no comment or criticism to make with regard to its decision at that time.

The war, however, is now over, and I think it is the desire of every person, the Railroad Administration included, that the jurisdiction which the commission formerly had should be restored. I am led to make that remark not from any communication which I have had with the officers of the administration, but I am led to make it because it has become the policy of the Railroad Administration to refer these matters largely to the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Railroad Administration has discovered the impossibility of dealing with railroad rates in a way just to the public, just to the shipper, and just to the Government itself.

The bill does nothing more than put the President of the United States and the Director General in the stead of the railway companies so far as initiating rates is concerned, and, when the rates have been initiated by the President or by the Director General, the Interstate Commerce Commission has the same authority over them for suspension, for revision, and for other investigation that it formerly had over the railway companies when they initiated the rates and filed their tariffs with the commission.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, would it disturb the Senator if I interrupted him?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Will the passage of this bill be used as an excuse or pretext—and I do not use those words offensively—by the Director General and those now operating the railroads to justify any expenditures made by them or any failure upon their part, or any maladministration upon their part; that is to say will they contend that the passage of this bill hampers them, precludes the carrying out of the economies and wise and just policies which they have in view and which they were about to put into operation and would have put into operation except for the passage of this measure?

Mr. CUMMINS. I can not answer that question definitely, because I have had no communication with the Railroad Administration that will warrant me in answering it. I have had a very brief discussion of the matter with the Director General, and all that he asked me with regard to the bill was whether the bill interfered with the authority of the President or the Director General to control intrastate rates. I replied to him that in my judgment it did not have any such effect; that it was confined to the restoration of the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission over rates which affected interstate commerce and applied to no other rates. Whether he ought to have replied to me suggesting either his friendliness toward the bill or his opposition to the bill, I will not say. It is sufficient, however, to say that he made no objection at that time or at any other time, so far as I know.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. KING. I am in sympathy with this bill. I feel that we ought to reinstate the Interstate Commerce Commission in the position that it formerly occupied, and give it the powers which the interstate commerce act conferred upon it, and that that ought to be done at the earliest possible moment. As the Senator from Iowa was speaking the thought occurred to me that it might be possible that the passage of this bill now would be regarded as premature, in view of the fact that there is legislation pending to restore the railroads to private ownership and control at an early date; and the thought suggested itself in my mind that, in view of the great expense that has been incurred in governmental operation, and the great loss of revenue, if this bill were passed and those deficits continued and the lack of proper administration continued, those in charge of the railroads might attempt to lay the blame for future losses and deficits upon this legislation.

In making this statement, I do not mean to condemn in any way the present Director General or his predecessor. I think perhaps they have performed the very onerous duties resting upon them as ably as any man could have done; but the system is wrong. The governmental attempt to operate and control railroads is wrong. It will be a failure; it will involve expense and extravagance, I do not care who is in control of it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I believe the fear of the Senator from Utah is unfounded, and I think he will recognize that no harm can come from this course upon a moment's reflection.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator will just pardon me until I answer the Senator from Utah, then I will yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

The President and the Director General have the power to initiate rates, to file tariffs with the Interstate Commerce Commission under the act which I propose; and if they desire to lessen the deficit or to increase the rates in order to diminish the loss to which the Government is daily subject, they are at perfect liberty to do so; and I assume that the Interstate Commerce Commission would not prevent the execution of those rates if that body believed an increase to be necessary in order that the revenues may measure up more nearly to the expenses. The Director General, with whom I am upon the most friendly personal terms, knows that this bill is pending, and he has not directly or indirectly conveyed to me any objection to it.

I now yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, this bill as amended is very objectionable and ought not to pass in its present form. It is subject to a far more serious objection than the Senator from Utah has stated. The Supreme Court has lately decided, in the Dakota case—a railroad and telephone case—that under the legislation existing now, under our war legislation, the Railroad Administration has as full control over intrastate rates as over interstate rates.

I want to call the Senator's attention to the very queer phraseology of this amendment. It simply, ex industria, restores the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission as to interstate rates, but leaves the State rates, the intrastate rates, at the mercy of the present Railroad Administration.

Let me read the language:

That during the period of Federal control the right to initiate or change rates, fares, charges, classifications, regulations, and practices, exercised by the carriers now under Federal control, prior to the 29th day of December, 1917, shall hereafter be exercised by the President, or by the Director General of Railroads, but such right as to interstate commerce shall be exercised under all the limitations and conditions which were imposed upon said right by the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, as amended.

In other words, it restores to the Interstate Commerce Commission the full control of interstate rates, but it leaves intrastate rates absolutely under the control of the Railroad Administration by an amendment in italics which you have put into the bill here.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know that.

Mr. NELSON. Why, I ask, should you relieve interstate rates and then put State rates at the mercy of the Railroad Administration? Why should you not relieve the States as well as the Federal Government? Why should you not relieve intrastate rates as well as Federal rates from the onus of this railroad legislation? Why make this discrimination? Why leave a State, as to State rates, at the mercy of the Railroad Administration and relieve it as to interstate rates?

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope the Senator from Minnesota will consider the matter somewhat calmly and dispassionately——

Mr. NELSON. I always consider it calmly.

Mr. CUMMINS. And not involve us all in a passion upon not so immaterial a question but a question that really ought to be considered with a good deal of care.

Mr. NELSON. Does the Senator deny—if he will allow me the question, Mr. President—that it leaves intrastate rates under the control of the Railroad Administration as now existing?

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course I do not.

Mr. NELSON. No. All your bill accomplishes is to relieve the Railroad Administration from control over interstate rates.

Mr. CUMMINS. Which gives the Interstate Commerce Commission jurisdiction over 90 per cent of all the traffic of the United States.

Mr. THOMAS. And it never has had jurisdiction over intrastate rates.

Mr. NELSON. I am anxious to have the States retain the control that they have exercised heretofore over the State rates; and I do not know why we should make any distinction and favor these interstate rates instead of our local State rates. Why leave the States in the lurch? Why leave them in purgatory and take the others out of it?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Minnesota had been as patient as he usually is and had not yielded to the impulses which very rarely control him, I would have reached that part of the bill and attempted to explain it. I have been rather fiercely denounced before the Senator has even heard an explanation of the reasons which seemed sufficient to the committee.

The Senator will observe that the amendment is one which was not in the original bill. It was proposed in the committee and was adopted by the unanimous vote of the committee. It can not be assumed that the members of the committee have any malicious designs upon the power or the authority of the several States; and the Senator from Minnesota, it seems to me, ought to have assumed that there was some reason which at least seemed sufficient to the committee.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will allow me, why would it not have been easy to put into this bill a provision that the Railroad Administration shall have no more control over intrastate than over interstate rates?

Mr. CUMMINS. It would have been perfectly easy, so far as a matter of words is concerned; but if, in the judgment of the committee, the Federal Railroad Administration, during what I hope will be a short period of control, ought to have control over intrastate rates, the Senator may find in that the reason for the action of the committee.

Now, if the Senator will allow me to explain for just a moment what the situation really is, I am sure that it will relieve us from the imputation that we have done an inconsiderate and an unpremeditated thing.

The railroads are in the hands of the Federal Government. Just when they will pass out of the hands of the Federal Government into other instrumentalities I do not know. No man dares predict just when that will happen. The Interstate Commerce Commission is a function of the Federal Government. When we were considering the bill originally it was simply a question as to whether the function of passing upon rates or initiating rates or suspending rates, which unquestionably belonged to the power which was intended to operate the property, should be reserved to the Interstate Commerce Commission, which was acting for the Federal Government, or whether it should be exercised by the Director General, who was also acting for the Federal Government. To transfer to one branch of the Federal Government the right to revise or suspend rates which have been initiated or published by another branch of the Federal Government is a very different thing from restoring to the several States their power over intrastate commerce. It must be remembered that this bill stands upon its necessity as a war measure; and I have so often heard the Senator from Minnesota uphold the power of the Federal Government in executing the designs of the war that I am sure he will be in sympathy with me. It is the first time that I have ever heard from him the suggestion that while this act remains as a war measure, the power of the Federal Government should be subordinated to the power of the States.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. Granting that it is a war measure, why do you keep up a war measure against the States and not against the Interstate Commerce Commission? Why should you perpetuate it? Does not the Senator know that the railroads are aiming to have the Interstate Commerce Commission get control of intrastate traffic; that Justice Hughes, in his decision in the Minnesota rate cases, squinted in that direction and intimated that Congress had the power to do that; and by leaving, as you do in this bill, this remnant of control in the Railroad Administration, you leave an entering wedge for them to carry out this policy of the railroads?

Mr. CUMMINS. On the contrary, Mr. President, this distinction which we make here, if preserved, will accomplish a different object. I am just as much opposed to the attempt to take away from the State authorities their constitutional right to regulate intrastate commerce as the Senator from Minnesota can possibly be; but so long as the Government of the United States is in operation of these properties—and I hope that will not be long—it is illogical, it is indefensible, from my standpoint, to compel the Government of the United States in its operation of the properties to submit to the State authority other than was prescribed in the original act.

I think there is a vast distinction between the cooperation of the Director General with the Interstate Commerce Commission and the subordination of the Director General to the rates which have been established in the various States. If the Senator from Minnesota desires to test the sentiment of the Senate with regard to that question, I shall be very glad to have him do it. I confess I have very much sympathy with him; but it disorders the system which has been established. It makes it impossible at this time to proceed in a way that will enable the Railroad Administration to earn the revenue which it is absolutely necessary for it to earn if we are not to be involved in a loss that will be appalling to the American people.

Last year in Government operation we suffered a loss of $240,000,000. During the first four months of this year we have suffered a loss of $250,000,000; and if the rates which have been made by the Director General are to be reduced in the various 48 States of the Union without any possibility of cooperation, without any possibility of relating these rates to each other as they should be related, our loss at the end of the present year may reach $750,000,000.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. That argument amounts simply to this—that it will make the States victims of the loss. Now, where does the bill leave you if it passes? It leaves, as a matter of fact, two tribunals for the adjustment of railroad rates. The interstate rates will be regulated, under your bill, by the Interstate Commerce Commission. The intrastate rates, rates within a State, will be still controlled by the Railroad Administration. As to the argument which the Senator advances that we are running the railroad system at a loss, we are falling behind, does the Senator seek to imply by that that we should make up these losses by holding the 48 States under a separate control, and leave them at the mercy of the Railroad Administration?

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator know whether the State rates are higher or lower than the interstate rates?

Mr. NELSON. They were lower before the Railroad Administration got hold of it, but after they got hold of it they got to be higher.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think that is true.

Mr. NELSON. I know it is true.

Mr. CUMMINS. They were lower, but they are not now higher. The same changes that the Director General has made—I will not enter upon a discussion of the necessity or wisdom of those changes—in interstate business he has made in intrastate business. The intrastate rates have not been raised above the interstate rates.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CUMMINS. And the State of North Dakota recently passed a statute which reduced the rates, I think, by one-half, and reduced them in such a way that no person who is familiar with the situation would for a single moment enter upon a justification of the reduction.

Mr. NELSON. No; but, Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me——

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I will give the Senator a different case from that. We had in Minnesota a 2-cent passenger rate existing and acquiesced in by the railroads for several years. The new Railroad Administration came in and increased it to 3 cents a mile, and for a while, as the Senator knows, if he took a sleeping car, it was increased a little more than that; but at all events it increased it, and kept it at 3 cents a mile instead of 2 cents a mile under our State legislation and State administration; and the increases made in transportation rates on freight were even greater than that, even a greater proportion. I know of some cases where the Railroad Administration increased local rates in the State of Minnesota to the extent of 200 per cent, and they destroyed a great many little wholesale stores that we had in the State—absolutely ruined them. Where they had established wholesale grocery stores and wholesale fruit stores under State administration, and where the railroads had given them rates, they were utterly ruined and driven out of business.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know of cases where interstate rates have been increased 700 per cent, so the instance suggested by the Senator from Minnesota is not peculiar to the State rates.

Mr. NELSON. But, Mr. President—perhaps I am interrupting the Senator——

Mr. CUMMINS. Not at all.

Mr. NELSON. But here is one question: Why can we not in this bill relieve the State rates from the incubus or burden of this Railway Administration just as well as we relieve the interstate rates?

Mr. CUMMINS. I should like very much to do that if it can be safely done; but I am treating the United States as the operator of this property. I know of no stancher defender of the jurisdiction and power of the United States than the Senator from Minnesota. I desire to end that possession at the earliest possible moment; but so long as the United States is in possession of the property and is operating it and is responsible for its revenues as well as its expenses, it must have some of the privileges of an owner and operator of such property.

Suppose we were to pass such a bill as is suggested by the Senator from Minnesota and every State should reduce the rates to the point where they were before the Railroad Administration assumed control. We would have a 2-cent fare in Minnesota, in Iowa, in Nebraska, I think in both of the Dakotas, and we would have a 3 or a 3½ cent rate for all through business. Does the Senator from Minnesota think that is a desirable situation?

Mr. NELSON. No; but, Mr. President, the Senator assumes in that case that the Interstate Commerce Commission will make no changes in rates. He proposes to divest the Railroad Administration of the power of making rates and confer it upon the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Senator assumes in his very statement that the Interstate Commerce Commission will retain the present rate of 3½ cents.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think rates will have to be very much increased all over the country. I am sorry to say that. No one regrets to say it more than I do.

Mr. NELSON. Well, whether they are increased or not, I want a fair deal. I do not want the States discriminated against. I do not want their rates to be left under the Railroad Administration and the rates of the other roads left immune.

Mr. CUMMINS. No more do I; and when the transportation comes to be furnished by private companies, as I hope will be the case before very long, then the Senator will find me as earnest a defender of the rights of the several States in adjusting the regulations and in fixing the rates upon intrastate traffic as he can possibly be; but I see a vast difference between the submission of a private corporation to the authority of the several States, so far as rates are concerned, and the submission of the Government of the United States to the several States. If I am wrong about that, if there is no difference between the two cases, then, of course, the conclusion of the Senator from Minnesota inevitably follows.

Just a moment with regard to any hope of decreasing rates; and that, of course, is what the Senator from Minnesota desires, and it is a perfectly natural desire. He wants to see all the States reduce the rates to the point at which they stood prior to the war or prior to our entrance upon this great undertaking. As I said a moment ago——

Mr. NELSON rose.

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment, and I will yield gladly. I want the Senator to have in mind just what is happening. As I said a moment ago, in the year 1918, notwithstanding the fact that the Government increased the rates about the middle of the year 25 per cent upon an average, many of them, however, being increased vastly more than that and some of them less, notwithstanding the fact that the railroads of this country earned in the year 1918 $800,000,000 more than they earned in the year 1917, which was the best year the railroads ever experienced in all of their history, we lost $240,000,000 in the operation. In the first four months of this year, notwithstanding additional increases, no great or general increases but some additional increases, by reason of the diminished traffic and the enhanced expenses of operation, we lost, as I said before, nearly $250,000,000.

Unless a miracle happens during the year, our total loss at the end of the year can not be fairly estimated at less than $600,000,000 or $650,000,000.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. In just a moment. Somehow we must bring the expenses of the railroads and the revenues of the railroads into closer relation with each other. If we do not we are all lost in hopeless bankruptcy. We will not only have imposed upon the United States a vast debt, but we will have so impaired our transportation facilities that they will not answer the demands of commerce. I must yield to the Senator from Minnesota first.

Mr. NELSON. It is perhaps a little late, but the Senator from Iowa intimated awhile ago that it is my great zeal to have the State rates reduced to the old basis. That is not my chief interest. My chief interest is to preserve the rights of the States to control rates within their own borders. I am more anxious about that.

The Senator has told us how many millions we have run behind. Will the Senator explain how those losses occurred? I understand the Railroad Administration have added to the force of employees upward of 60,000 men.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know. I can tell the Senator——

Mr. NELSON. Permit me to ask the Senator if he does not think he ought to draw a lesson from what was stated so eloquently by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] about this telegraph bill, to show the result of Government control and operation? For a few months they have had control of the telegraph and telephone lines and they have run them into the ground. With that lesson before you, why do you not aim to take the railroads out of the Railroad Administration as soon as possible and put them back into private hands the same as you have the telegraph and telephone companies?

Mr. CUMMINS. I wish to assure my friend, the Senator from Minnesota, there is no man in this assembly or in the United States or in the world who is so anxious to return these properties to private operation as I am. But if we were at this moment to pass a bill such as the telegraph bill, there is not a railroad in the United States, possibly save two or three, that would not be in the hands of a receiver within 30 days. We might just as well face the situation. There is no glamor about it. If the railroads were returned to their owners at this moment with the rates which now prevail and with the cost of maintenance and operation which now exists—I may be overdrawing it a little—there are not one-half of the railroads in the country that could earn interest upon their bonds.

No man ought to talk, as has been suggested in other circles, lightly about returning these properties to their owners until we have effective and substantial and helpful legislation that will enable them to continue to furnish to the people of the country the transportation which our commerce demands.

I now yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I desire to add this suggestion to what the Senator from Iowa has already said: I am in hearty accord with what the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] has said with respect to getting the rate-making power out of the hands of the Director General's office, but I think a study of this question will convince him, as it has myself and some others, that it is necessary that we have some perhaps general legislation bearing on the subject. Suffice it to say that it was sufficient for me to consent to the report of this bill in its present form because I realize that one of the very strong reasons why the rate-making power, so far as interstate commerce is concerned, should be returned to the Interstate Commerce Commission, is not that the Director General's office had increased the rates, but that they had increased them inequitably, because they attempted to formulate a committee or a commission which was operating independently of the Interstate Commerce Commission. They made certain changes in classification. The word was given to the country that there was an increase of 25 per cent, but when you took into consideration the changes in classification, it meant, for instance, so far as rough grain was concerned in the Middle West, an increase of from 50 to 60 per cent. It appeared before our committee that in certain classes of freight from New Orleans there was an increase of 240 per cent. One of the members of the committee stated that in his own State he had information that there were increases of 500 per cent. I want, if I can, to get just as much as possible of this rate-making power taken away from the Director General's office and restore it to the Interstate Commerce Commission, a body that has been built up, that has existed and worked for 30 years, and take it out of the hands of some of the incompetents who are down there in the Director General's office.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it is evident we will not be able to conclude the consideration of the pending bill to-day. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, June 11, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 10, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, our heavenly Father, let Thy holy influence find its way into our waiting hearts, that our legislative acts this day may be in consonance with Thy holy will and make for American citizenship among our people and for righteousness in the midst of a world of sorrow and grief; and Thine shall be the praise through Him who taught us love and good will to all mankind. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SWEARING IN A MEMBER.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Louisiana, Representative elect JAMES O'CONNOR, who was elected on June 5 from the first congressional district of Louisiana in succession to Gen. Albert Estopinal, lately deceased, is present in the Chamber and prepared to take the oath, with the consent of the House. His credentials have not arrived. Under the laws of the State of Louisiana the same can not be issued until June 16, and naturally can not reach Washington for two or three days thereafter. Inasmuch as Mr. O'CONNOR had no opposition, either in the primaries or in the general election, and there is no question as to his right to sit in this body, I ask unanimous consent, in conformity with many previous precedents, that the requirement in regard to credentials be waived in this case and that the oath be now administered to him.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent that his colleague, Mr. O'CONNOR, be allowed to take the oath of office without the credentials being presented. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I understand there is no question about Mr. O'CONNOR's election or in regard to the regularity of his election, and there is no question but that in due time his credentials will arrive. Therefore I shall not object.

Mr. DUPRÉ. In regard to the latter statement I will say that there is no question about the fact that his credentials will in due time arrive, and in regard to the preceding suggestion I will say, if I may, that I think the gentleman from Wyoming would be very glad to have the condition apply to his own case—that there is absolutely no question about the fact that he was duly elected and received—oh, I do not know how many thousands of votes; I think there were 18 scattered throughout the district.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana will step forward and take the oath of office.

Mr. O'CONNOR, accompanied by Mr. DUPRÉ, appeared before the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2480) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 1213. To amend an act entitled "An act to provide for vocational rehabilitation and return to civil employment of disabled persons discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 27, 1918; to the Committee on Education.

VICTOR L. BERGER.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to vacate back to the amending stage the proceedings by which the House passed House resolution No. 6, providing for the appointment of a committee to report on the right of Mr. Berger to a seat in the House.

I will state, Mr. Speaker, that I do this for the reason that, owing to an error on the part of the Clerk in copying the name from the certificate sent by the governor of Wisconsin, the name was printed on the roll as "Victor Berger," instead of "Victor L. Berger," which is the right name.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to vacate back to the amending stage the proceedings had on the resolution relative to Mr. Berger.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, while I think all this performance is superfluous after it is done, yet I think this will not do any harm, and therefore I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DALLINGER moves to amend House resolution No. 6, on page 1, line 2, after the word "Victor," by inserting the initial letter "L.;" and on line 8, after the word "Victor," inserting the initial letter "L."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The same amendment will be applied to the title, unless there is objection. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

PERMISSION TO A COMMITTEE TO SIT DURING THE SESSION.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota offers a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolution authorizing the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to sit during the sessions of the House.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads and subcommittees thereof have leave to sit during the sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I am in receipt of a communication from Chicago inclosing some statistics that were gathered there by some members of the Chicago Post Office Clerks' Union on the question of postal wages and working conditions, and I ask unanimous consent that these may be incorporated in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD for the purpose suggested. Is there objection?

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think most of us received that pamphlet. What does the gentleman expect to accomplish by inserting it in the RECORD?

Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY. Nothing more than to have it incorporated in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the future record and for the guidance of some of the Members in case they may desire to consult it.

Mr. BLACK. Further reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, we have a commission now that is investigating that whole question, and I have no doubt but that that commission will go into all of the facts stated in the pamphlet that the gentleman has received. I have received a copy of that pamphlet. It is a very interesting one, but I will have to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 2480) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York calls up the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill and asks that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I reserve all points of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri reserves all points of order on the conference report. Is there objection to the statement being read in lieu of the report?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement of the House conferees.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2480) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses for the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, having met after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

Strike out the matter covered by amendment No. 9 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in his discretion and under such terms and conditions as he may prescribe, to cause to be issued to the Gospel Missionary Union, which has engaged in mission work among the Navajo Indians since 1896, a patent in fee, for mission purposes only, for that particular tract of land on the Western Navajo Reservation, in Arizona, not exceeding 160 acres in area, which it has continuously used and occupied for mission purposes from a date prior to the Executive order of January 8, 1900, withdrawing from sale and settlement the lands which now constitute the said reservation; said patent in fee shall be issued on a legal description of the land so used: Provided, That if said land shall cease to be used for mission purposes the same shall revert to the Navajo Tribe of Indians"; and the Senate agree to the same.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SNYDER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

RAILROAD DEFICIENCY.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the deficiency appropriation for railroads (H. R. 5312), and pending that motion I will ask the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] if we can agree on time for general debate.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. What does the gentleman suggest? I agreed with the gentleman this morning that we would have one hour on a side. That is satisfactory to me unless the gentleman has changed his mind.

Mr. GOOD. I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate be limited to two hours, one hour to be controlled by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] and one by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate be limited to two hours, one hour to be controlled by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] and one hour by himself. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, will that take care of my 10 minutes?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I will say to the gentleman frankly that I am satisfied I will not be able to take care of him in the hour, because I have received requests that make it impossible to do so; but I am satisfied that under the five-minute rule the gentleman will have ample opportunity, and there will be no disposition to cut the gentleman off.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. GOOD was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5312) to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for carrying out the act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918, with Mr. ANDERSON in the chair.

Mr. ANDERSON took the chair amid applause.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 5312, which the Clerk will report.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for carrying out the act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918, there is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $750,000,000, which shall be in addition to the appropriation of $500,000,000 made in section 6 of said act, and shall be subject in all respects to the same authority for, and restriction of, expenditure as the said $500,000,000.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, in the last Congress a bill passed the House carrying an appropriation of $750,000,000 to supply a deficiency in the Railroad Administration. That bill failed of final enactment, and the Director General of Railroads has made another estimate for this service, to supply the deficiencies in the operation of the railroads during the year 1918 and for anticipated deficiencies in 1919 of $1,200,000,000. The committee has reported out the bill carrying $750,000,000. In making this report the committee does not say that $750,000,000 will be all that will be required to pay the deficit of last year and the deficit for the balance of the year 1919, but it does say that it is sufficient to permit the Railroad Administration to pay all of its obligations that are outstanding at the present time, both to the railroad companies for the standard return and to pay the equipment companies for the balances due for equipment it has purchased. The committee is satisfied that the entire amount carried by this bill is required. It may, and not unlikely will, be necessary to make additional appropriations for this service.

But it is the opinion of the committee that additional requirements are so indefinite and uncertain that the appropriation therefor may well await future action by Congress when the needs for additional funds are more clearly apparent. So much depends upon the extent to which the railroads are able to finance themselves and upon operations for the remainder of the year.

The sum recommended in the bill, however, will meet the situation until the latter part of the calendar year, when the Railroad Administration will be in a much better position to state what further amount the Government will be called upon to appropriate to fulfill the provisions of the Federal-control act.

The Army appropriation act of August 29, 1916, carried a provision giving the President the power in time of war to take over and operate the railroads and inland waterways of the United States. Pursuant to that act, on the 26th day of December, 1917, the President by a proclamation took over all the railroads of the United States. Subsequently and on March 21, 1919, Congress enacted a law providing for the Government control and operation of the railroads and appropriated $500,000,000 as a revolving fund for their operation. Since that time, therefore, the President of the United States, both by the provisions of the Army appropriation act and the provisions of the railroad-control act of March 21, 1918, has been operating practically all the railroads in the United States, the mileage of the railroads under actual control and operation aggregating 239,893 miles, or more than 98 per cent of the total mileage of the railroads in the United States.

This appropriation does not involve in the slightest degree the question of whether or not it was necessary or advisable for the President at that time to take control and operation of the railroads. We are brought face to face now with a condition and not a theory. The President did exercise that power, and thereafter Congress enacted a law continuing Federal control and providing how the roads should be operated. That law provided a basis for determining the amount of the standard return or rental the railroads would be entitled to and provided a plan for the maintenance and equipment of all the railroads under Federal control by the Railroad Administration.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. The law that the Congress passed authorized the President to make contracts within the average amount of the earnings for three years prior to the taking over of the roads, but it did not compel him to make contracts absorbing the entire amount earned on the average during those three years. Can the gentleman tell us what proportion of the entire earnings the Government is obligated to pay under these contracts?

Mr. GOOD. If I understand the gentleman's question the Government in the first place is obligated to pay under these rental contracts $940,669,104.57 annually so long as under Federal control. Some of the railroads have not executed the rental contract, and there may be some change, but the change will increase the total and will not diminish it.

Mr. MADDEN. What was the total average earnings for the three years? Was it $961,000,000 or $931,000,000?

Mr. GOOD. The average return for the three years was something less than $940,000,000, but the act provided that in special instances, where, for instance, a part of a road had been constructed subsequent to 1915 or 1916, and was not in operation during the entire three prewar years, a special allowance could be made to such roads, and there have been special allowances made to cover just such contingencies.

Mr. MADDEN. My understanding of the law is, without being clear as to its exact language, that it was not within the power of the President of the United States to make contracts beyond the amount the earnings averaged for the period of three years, but that he could make contracts within that limit and for as much less than that as it is possible for him to make it.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman is right in assuming that the law provides a method for determining this standard return. It provides that rental should be paid to the railroads by the Railroad Administration, based upon the average that each road earned during the three prewar years—the years 1915, 1916, and 1917. That law also contains this provision:

"If the President shall find that the condition of any carrier was during all or a substantial portion of the period of three years ended June 30, 1917, because of nonoperation, receivership, or where recent expenditures for additions or improvements or equipment were not fully reflected in the operating railway income of said three years or a substantial portion thereof, or because of any undeveloped or abnormal conditions, so exceptional as to make the basis of earning hereinabove provided for plainly inequitable as a fair measure of just compensation, then the President may make with the carrier such agreement for such amount as just compensation as under the circumstances of the particular case he shall find just."

If, therefore, a road was not operating all its lines that the Government took over in pursuance of this law during all of the three prewar years, or if during the three prewar years had doubled-tracked the systems or made additions and betterments that radically changed its condition and earning power, these matters which resulted in increased earnings should be taken into consideration, and to a considerable extent claims have already been allowed for such additional investment, and this allowance is provided for in the law and also in the contracts.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I will.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Have the contracts that the Railroad Administrator made with various railroads for compensation under the law been submitted to the gentleman's committee?

Mr. GOOD. The form of the contracts has been, and will be found in the hearings, but the contracts for the separate roads were not submitted and were not asked for.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman advise the House whether any contract was made with any railroad for less than the three years' average referred to by the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. GOOD. I do not know of any contract, and our attention was not called to any contract, with any railroad company where the amount of the standard return was less than the average operating income for the three prewar years.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The gentleman will remember that that was the maximum, and it was said that undoubtedly the President or the Director General of Railroads would make contracts for less than the average provided for in the law. What I am trying to get at is whether there was any one instance where a contract was made for less than the standard return.

Mr. GOOD. The committee did not go into that and I am not advised as to the facts. Possibly some railroads receive less than the average operating income for the three prewar years, but I do not think so.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman will yield, the gentleman is advised that the aggregate amount of the contracts is more than the amount of the standard earnings.

Mr. GOOD. I am not sure that I understand the gentleman. The operating income of the railroads would not amount to $940,000,000. That is, the income after the payment of all operating expenses and taxes does not amount to $940,000,000 during the year, but it failed by $236,000,000 in 1918.

Mr. MADDEN. That is, $236,000,000 last year; but I am talking about the contracts that the Government entered into to pay the railroads the standard returns, and whether these contracts are not more in the aggregate than the three years' average earnings?

Mr. GOOD. They are more than the standard returns. Claims in addition to the standard returns amounting to $3,709,887.09 have been allowed and there are like claims still pending, aggregating $26,285,606.51.

We must consider that when the roads were taken over a little different condition prevailed than at present. We were at war. Aside from that, during 1917 there had been an advance in wages of the labor employed by the railroad companies of about 12½ per cent. The Interstate Commerce Commission had not increased the rates of the railroad companies to meet the increased compensation granted the employees. They had begun to feel the increasing cost of operation and maintenance.

Congestion, especially in the eastern lines, had practically tied up some of the great railroads. A labor crisis was threatening, and there were a great many things of this kind that I have no doubt actuated the President in taking over the roads at that time. Whether or not all these things combined justify the taking over the roads I do not care at this time to express an opinion. As I stated before, we are face to face with the fact that the roads were taken over; they have been operated for a year and a half, and that for the first year there has been an admitted deficit of $236,000,000 in the operation of the roads and for the first four months of this year an admitted deficit of $250,000,000. That these sums will be increased anyone familiar with the situation must admit.

I am satisfied that these deficits do not begin to measure the full amount of the deficit that will actually come to the Government by reason of the operation of the roads.

In the first place, the Government appropriated $500,000,000. It had to borrow that amount of money, and the Railroad Administration has been using it for practically all of 1918. If we add to the deficit the amount of interest on that amount of money, we would increase the deficit at once by about $25,000,000.

Then, too, the Government for years to come will be paying losses and damages for personal-injury claims. The Government will have settlement to make with regard to the equipment that was purchased for the railroads. Some of the roads refuse to accept the equipment allotted to them. It must be remembered that when the President took over the railroads he took over the complete operation of the railroads. He took the property of the railroad companies in use for transportation purposes. He operated these roads just as if he owned them. He employed the labor, made the improvements, paid the taxes, kept up the betterments and the maintenance of the roads, and paid such judgments and claims as originated in the operation.

The Government stands to lose a substantial amount on the $100,000,000 which it has advanced to the various roads and for the payment of which it holds certain supplies and material. With some of the weaker roads the supplies and material held for the repayment of the amount which such roads owe the Railroad Administration is not sufficient to guarantee the obligation. Unquestionably claims will be made against the Railroad Administration for damage because of deferred maintenance. While, on the whole, the statement made by the Director General would indicate the roads have been maintained in accordance with the contract requirements, yet unquestionably many roads will claim that their properties have not been maintained on the standard of the general average, and will make claims for damage on this account.

No one who has given any study to this subject doubts the fact that hundreds of short-line railroads have substantial claims that must somehow be paid, and that that payment must come out of the Treasury of the United States. It is indeed to be regretted that the short-line railroads of the country have not been treated more fairly so far as Government control and operation is concerned. Since the roads were taken over on the 28th of December, 1917, this class of roads has never known what its real status was unless they have been recently advised. At first they were all taken under Federal control and remained under Federal control and operation for several months, when the President released a large number of them. From the beginning of Federal control freight and traffic that would naturally have gone to these roads has been diverted to other channels, whether under Government control and operation or not. They have suffered an irreparable loss; but to some extent, sometime, this loss must be paid if the Government is to deal fairly and honorably with the owners of this class of property.

It is to be hoped that the Director General will in the future give consideration to the just claims of this class of roads, and that when the Director General again asks Congress for additional appropriations he will be able to show that not only the rental due the trunk-line railroads has been paid, but that substantial progress has been made in a fair and just settlement with the short-line railroads.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman has called attention to $236,000,000 it lost last year and $250,000,000 in the first four months of this year, and $25,000,000 interest that has not been charged up against that, and possibly other things, but he has not said anything about the $100,000,000 in excess of passenger service and increased freight rates which the roads received and which would be a loss to the American people. Why not add that?

Mr. GOOD. That is true; there were increases in freight and passenger rates which were in effect about six months of the year. That increase in rates resulted in a total increase in operating revenue of about $560,000,000. If it had been applied for the entire year it would have resulted in an increase of about $950,000,000 or $1,000,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. It would be $1,100,000,000.

Mr. GOOD. No; it would not be that amount, because the gentleman will note that during the first four months of the year there is always a falling off, in freight traffic especially. The decrease in freight traffic for the first three or four months of a year as compared with the months of August, September, October, and November is very marked, and I think if the rates had been in effect for the entire year it would have produced in the neighborhood of $950,000,000 or $1,000,000,000.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I agree entirely with my colleague that the amount of debts stated by the Director General is not the whole amount of deficit. There is another matter which I think ought to be mentioned. It has been stated, and I think possibly in the hearings, although I am not sure of that, but by railroad experts, who ought to know about the matter, that the condition of equipment and ways of railroads has been permitted to run down; that it is not as good as it was when the roads were taken over. If so, that would represent another item that would eventually have to be made up, would it not?

Mr. GOOD. I am aware that such claims have been made, and some loss may result from deferred maintenance, but I do not believe there is very much, if anything, in that claim. If the gentleman will turn to page 47 of the hearings, he will find that during the three prewar years the railroads themselves invested in maintenance of ways and structures $403,501,408. That was the average for the prewar years, whereas for 1918 the Railroad Administration paid $653,869,469, or an increase of $250,000,000, in maintenance of ways and structures. So, too, we find the same condition in regard to the maintenance of equipment. The average for the three prewar years was $563,978,613, whereas the Director General expended last year in maintenance of equipment $1,108,030,396. In other words, there was paid for maintenance of equipment $544,051,783 more in 1918 than the amount paid for a like purpose for the average of the test period. That maintenance, of course, was composed of labor and material that was purchased at higher price than like articles were purchased at during the test period; but, after full credit is given for increased costs, it seems to me that the Director General has, so far as maintenance of ways and structures and maintenance of equipment are concerned, expended enough money at least to keep them up to the standard required in the contract.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is aware that prices of most articles of maintenance have practically doubled and wages have greatly increased, but aside from that matter I suppose that anyone who has been traveling over the railroads to any great extent, observing the condition of the roadbeds and equipment, would agree with the statement that it had not been fully kept up.

Mr. GOOD. I can not say how efficiently or wisely the money has been expended. I only state from the money standpoint that the amount expended was sufficient for maintenance of the roads as provided for in the contract, even considering the increase in the cost of materials and labor.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. Of course, we know that the Government had to take charge of railroads under the war powers, and that in the emergency we had to depend upon the railroad people to operate the roads. Some people claim that the railroad people were afraid of Government ownership, and in order to provide against that they made the service as unpopular and as expensive as possible. Has the gentleman any opinion about that that he would care to express?

Mr. GOOD. The committee attempted to find out whether or not there was any truth in the reports that the railroads were being administered in a way to discourage the idea of public ownership; that is, whether or not the men left in official charge were fulfilling their duty patriotically and faithfully in executing this law.

It was the opinion of Mr. Hines that while under private control, as well as under Government operation, there is always a loss of property by theft, and inefficiency on the part of some officials, yet the loss in this respect was no greater than under private operation, so far as the management by officials was concerned; that the officials are attempting to get as much for the money expended under Federal control as did the officials under private operation.

The Director General did not state anything with regard to the efficiency of labor in that respect.

Mr. MADDEN. Did the Director General of Railroads say anything to the committee about the fact that they have more than 200,000 more men in the employ of the railroads doing less work than they had before the Government took them over?

Mr. GOOD. The committee inquired what the situation was in regard to the number of men employed by the railroad companies during the prewar period, as compared with 1918 or 1919. The Director General was not able to furnish us with an analysis that would make the comparison, and there were some very good reasons for it. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in 1917—I think it was in October—Congress enacted the Adamson law, which decreased the hours of service of railway employees from 10 hours per day to 8 hours per day. Therefore it was his contention that in making a comparison it should be in hours of service rather than in days of service. His attention was called to the fact that when that law was pending before Congress it was claimed that if the eight-hour day was adopted a man would perform in 8 hours as much labor or service as he had been accustomed to perform in 10 hours; but the statement of the Director General is that in so far as hours of service are concerned there is about the same number as formerly—a slight increase. If, however, we take days of service, while I think the gentleman's figures are a little large, yet I imagine there are about 140,000 or 150,000 more men employed on the railroads of the United States than during any of the prewar years.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It appears from the remarkable statement of the gentleman that the longer we keep these roads the more they run in debt, and the larger will be the debt incurred against the United States. I would like to inquire whether anything developed in the testimony to show that the debt will increase instead of decrease in the future?

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman means deficit in operation?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. I will say first to the gentleman it all depends upon the volume of business done by the railroads, and the indications are that the volume of business will greatly increase during the remainder of this year. Traffic movement can be seen from the operating income of the roads. The average operation income for the three-year prewar period—that is, the income after we deduct operating expenses and taxes—by month was about $77,000,000 per month; during the month of February the average for the three prewar years was only $47,000,000, but during the month of October the operating income reached the figure of $95,000,000. So while there has been some loss, a great loss so far this year, that should have been expected. The great loss during the first four months of this year, looking at it broadly, ought not to be made good during the remaining seven months. A study of the situation, I think, will convince anyone that during the first quarter of any year the railroads rarely, if ever, receive enough money to pay their operating expenses and allow them anything to speak of as a return on investment, but with an increase of business for the latter part of the year the loss, if any, during the first quarter is made up, and they are generally able to make their earnings and pay a fair return.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Can the gentleman tell the House what percentage of mile-tons of commodities are moved by the railroads now, as compared with the three-year prewar period?

Mr. GOOD. My recollection is that when you measure the traffic in ton-miles for the first four months of this year with the first four months of 1918 there is a falling off of about 14 per cent, but, strange to say, when you compare the ton-miles of freight moved for the first four months of this year with the average of the first four months of the prewar period it is practically the same, so that there is nothing very abnormal in the movement of freight at the present time, as compared with the average for the first four months of the prewar period. It is about normal. The passenger business is more than normal.

Mr. MADDEN. So that with the normal tonnage carried, as compared with the three prewar years, the railroads are still employing, according to the gentleman, more than 150,000 more men?

Mr. GOOD. Yes; but we must remember they are only working 8 hours a day, while the men then worked 10 hours a day.

Mr. JEFFERIS rose.

Mr. GOOD. I shall yield to the gentleman, and then I must decline to yield for a while.

Mr. JEFFERIS. Can the gentleman give some information as to the increase in wages the employees have received since, say, 1917?

Mr. GOOD. The increase, on the average, of wages paid employees of railroad companies during the time they have been under the control and operation of the Railroad Administration amounts approximately to 52 per cent, and that does not include 12½ per cent that was granted to the employees during the latter part of 1917. If we add the increase in wages of employees of railroad companies received during the latter part of 1917 with the wage increase allowed by the Director General we have a total increase in wages of about 65 per cent since the latter part of 1917.

Mr. JEFFERIS. And was that brought about by the action of the Railroad Administration?

Mr. GOOD. The 52 per cent was made by the Railroad Administration, but the 12½ per cent was made before the roads were taken over.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I will.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman has stated that the average increase was about 65 per cent in the wages of railroad employees.

Mr. GOOD. Since 1917.

Mr. SNYDER. Well, I just wanted to observe that it is no greater rate of increase than has taken place in almost every line of industry in this country.

Mr. GOOD. I will say in answer to the gentleman that Judge Gary has stated that since 1913 the increase in the labor cost of making a ton of steel is 128 per cent.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I will.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The total deficit for the Railroad Administration for the years 1918–19 seems to be $1,250,000,000. What I would like to know is this: Does that whole amount mean a loss to the Treasury or is some of this advances and loans and improvements that the railroads will have to pay back; and if so, how much is the total loss and how much will the railroads be under obligation to pay back into the Treasury of the United States? Has the gentleman those figures?

Mr. GOOD. The Railroad Administration hopes to pay back into the Treasury of the United States all the money that has been appropriated for 1918 operation and which may hereafter be appropriated for its operation except $236,000,000 loss for 1918 and $250,000,000 loss so far this year, less certain losses for inland waterways and some allowances for equipment and things of that kind. In other words, it recognizes an actual loss so far of $486,000,000. Now, I do not want to be discourteous, but I do want to try to give a picture of the situation presented, and I shall appreciate it if I may proceed for a few minutes without interruption.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. GOOD. I will.

Mr. FESS. I would like to have a little light on the very thing the gentleman has been suggesting, where Mr. Hines says that $1,214,000,000 of the $1,700,000,000 should be paid back to the Government by the railroads, and he also states of that sum $486,000,000 represents the loss which I take from what the gentleman says should be written off. What is the meaning of that statement?

Mr. GOOD. The meaning is this: He is dealing with hundreds of railroad companies. He is loaning money, for instance, to the New York, New Haven & Hartford amounting to $43,000,000. He is advancing money to all railroad companies practically for additions and betterments. He advanced for additions and betterments for 1918 about $352,000,000 and proposes to advance for like purposes for 1919 $253,000,000.

That is for additions and betterments. He is dealing with a hundred different railroads or more, and taking it all in all he figures that all of these loans he has made and proposes to make and all the amounts invested in various railroad properties in additions and betterments and the like will eventually be returned to the Government. There will be some additional losses, but he thinks it is speculative what those losses will be. He does not think they will be large, and I hope he is right in this regard.

After the railroads were taken over the Director General, as I have stated, increased the wages of employees to the extent of about 52 per cent on the average. The total amount of the increase of wages amounts to $852,000,000 during 1918. The increase in freight and passenger rates equaled about 25 per cent. That increase was only applicable for six months, or approximately six months, of the year. It brought in, in round figures, $560,000,000. The increase in the cost of material that went into the maintenance of the roads and maintenance of equipment averaged, according to the statement of the Director General, from 20 to 35 per cent. So in striking a balance with regard to the operation, without taking into account some of the things that I have alluded to as being elements of possible loss, he finds that the loss in operation last year was $236,000,000. I think it was rather remarkable that while we were face to face with a deficit last year of more than $20,000,000 per month in the operation of the roads the then Director General should, because of a slight demand from certain quarters, eliminate one of the large items of receipts. The Director General by an order had directed that one-half of 1 cent per mile should be collected as additional Pullman fares. That order was in effect only about six months, and yet it brought in $26,000,000. And by the cancellation of that order the Government loses about $50,000,000 annually that it would otherwise have received.

If you will look at the table on page 47 of the hearings, and also at the table on page 96 of the hearings, I think it will give you a pretty good picture of the Railroad Administration and of the operating revenue and operating expenses that are involved in these tremendous transactions.

The law providing for Federal operation of the railroads also provides that the President shall have power to take over the inland waterways.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman goes to that subject will he answer a question?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. ESCH. Under the additions and betterments, including equipments, the amounts expended by the Government are reimbursable, as I understand.

Mr. GOOD. The expenditures for additions and betterments and equipment are reimbursable.

Mr. ESCH. Now, then, the Government has ordered 100,000 freight cars and, I think, 3,000 locomotives, making a total cost of between $300,000,000 and $400,000,000. They are allocated to several railroad systems at the price which they cost the Government, which is the war price. Railroad systems are refusing to take the cars and locomotives allocated to the several systems. What will be the result? Will the Government get back the amount it costs the Government or will the railroads only have to pay the amount which the cars and locomotives would cost, for instance, in peace times?

Mr. GOOD. I thank the gentleman for calling my attention to that item. I intended to refer to it. Unquestionably the Railroad Administration committed a very grave error when it ordered all of this equipment. It ordered 100,000 freight cars and 2,900 locomotives. I do not say this equipment was not needed by the railroads. But the then Director General ordered this equipment without consulting the various railroads to which the cars and locomotives will be allotted. Now some of the roads are refusing to accept it. It is evident now, as we look at it, the country being at war, certain additional equipment for the railroads, taken as a whole, being necessary for their operation, if the railroad officials had been consulted at the time, the roads might have agreed as to the amount of equipment each road should take, and the equipment needed could have been purchased without loss, but for some reason or other an order was given to the equipment companies to build 100,000 cars and something over 2,900 locomotives. The total contract was for $402,000,000, but the contract provides for scaling down in the cost if, in the building of the cars and locomotives, it should be found there could be some saving. Now, they find by adjustments that they can save about $40,000,000 on those contracts. So the net amount which the Government is obligated to pay is about $363,000,000 for this equipment. This equipment is being allocated to the several railroad companies.

Forty-eight per cent of it has already been allocated and accepted. But, as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] points out, a great many of the railroads are objecting for one cause or another. One railroad objects because they claim that the equipment is not suitable to their line of railroad, another that they did not need the equipment that has been allocated to them, and still another objects that the amount of equipment is greatly in excess of the needs of the roads, and still others object as to cost. But in all cases the contract provides where they accept the equipment—and my recollection is that the law also makes similar provision—that the question of price shall not be an element upon which a loss can be predicated. But the Government stands to lose something on this equipment. We have a whole lot of equipment, and the former chairman of the committee, now director of finance, is at work trying to get the railroads of the country to agree to take this equipment, and is attempting to have them, in conjunction with some banks, organize an equipment trust in order that these railroads may take the equipment and that the Government of the United States may receive the money which it actually needs to pay for this equipment.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Will the gentleman yield in that connection?

Mr. GOOD. I am afraid I can not. How much time have I used, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used 39 minutes.

Mr. GOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I wanted to ask in that connection whether this statement is true or not: I have heard or read that the standard coal car on the Pennsylvania Road is a 70-ton car, and that under this order they allocated to the Pennsylvania Road a car of 55-ton capacity, so that if the Pennsylvania takes those cars and pays for them it will be a continuing loss to the road during the entire life of the car, of approximately 20 years? Is there a foundation for that statement?

Mr. GOOD. So far as the Pennsylvania Railroad is concerned—and my recollection may be faulty—I think if the gentleman will turn to the table with regard to the allocations he will find that the Pennsylvania Road has accepted its allotment, and of course if it has accepted its allotment there can be no loss from that road.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. But it would be a loss to the road and to the public through the use of an unsuitable car.

Mr. GOOD. There would be no loss to the Government, and what I have been considering in this whole matter is not so much in regard to any loss that might be suffered by an individual railroad company as the loss that must be paid out of the Federal Treasury.

Mr. OLNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for two or three questions?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. OLNEY. Could not the deficiency in the passenger traffic during the war be explained or excused partly, perhaps, by the fact that the railroads were obliged to carry men engaged in the military and naval service for 1 cent a mile during the war?

Mr. GOOD. Yes; I imagine some of the loss could be attributed to that.

Mr. OLNEY. There were hundreds of thousands of soldiers and sailors traveling back and forth.

Mr. GOOD. Yes. They traveled at a reduced rate. Also, I think we should take into consideration the fact that the traffic movement of troops did not cost on an average of what it costs to move other passengers as a general rule. The trains being heavy and being filled to full capacity made it possible for the roads to operate at a very low unit cost. Just what that loss would be I am not prepared to state.

Mr. OLNEY. Would the chairman of the committee consider this as a subsidy bill—in the nature of a subsidy or a gratuity to the railroads—to compensate them for deficiencies?

Mr. GOOD. The Director General did not present it in that light. So far as I am concerned, I feel that this bill is necessary in order to maintain the credit of the United States. We owe the railroad companies for last year's operations about $441,000,000 on their standard returns. The railroad companies owe the United States $352,553,455 for additions and betterments. Now, if the railroad companies could pay, we would only have to provide for last year's operations approximately $89,000,000.

Mr. OLNEY. And if this bill is passed it is an entering wedge against Government ownership, is it not?

Mr. GOOD. I do not think there will need to be any further entering wedge as against Government ownership. I believe when the people come to consider that last year, when they paid their freight bills, they were paying only about 90 per cent of what it cost the Government of the United States to carry the freight, and that out of the Treasury of the United States had to be paid the remaining 10 per cent, and if those who have been making shipments during the first four months of this year realize that if they paid the full cost to the Government of the service that the Government rendered in the way of moving freight they would have had to add 25 per cent more to their freight bills, at least that class of people will never favor Government ownership of railroads. [Applause.]

Mr. OLNEY. I am rather inclined against Government ownership of railroads but strongly favor Federal supervision.

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman that while this loss under Government control is large—and I believe that it will amount for 1918 to more than $325,000,000, and I do not doubt but what this year's operations will amount to the same—and that if we send the roads back at the end of the year we will have to pay at some time or other more than $650,000,000 as a loss chargeable to Government operation of the railroads—I say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that, so far as I am personally concerned, if that will settle the loss it will also settle probably for all time to come the question of public ownership of $17,000,000,000 of property covering 260,000 miles of railroads. It is a big sum to lose, but may it not be, after all, money pretty well spent, especially if it kills the Government-ownership bug? [Applause.]

Mr. OLNEY. I agree with you.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for just one other question?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. FESS. It has cost more to operate the railroads than they are getting.

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. FESS. What is your solution for running the roads when they are turned back to their owners?

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman that if I had my way about it and if we were to continue in Government operation for another year instead of only about six months I would ask to have adopted as an amendment to this bill a provision that would require the Director General of Railroads to so arrange and plan the affairs of their operation that the operating revenues would pay the operating expenses and the rentals due the railroad companies, so that these losses would not have to be financed out of the Treasury of the United States.

But the Director General discussed that at length. He thinks it would be unwise now to increase rates. He says he can not effect any greater economy either in the reduction of the number of men employed or in the reduction of wages and salaries, and that the only way the operating of these roads can be made to meet the operating expenses, plus the rentals and the taxes, is to increase the rates, and he says that that would disturb matters very materially and that at the present time it would be unwise.

Mr. FESS. Is it not a plain, common-sense proposition that you will have to increase the rates or reduce the expense? One or the other has got to be done.

Mr. GOOD. Personally I am inclined to think that even under private operation a great many of the roads, perhaps a third or more, so far as mileage is concerned, can not exist under private operation even at the present rate if the present high scale of wages and high cost of materials and supplies are to be maintained.

Mr. FESS. May I ask one other question?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Was there ever danger of bankruptcy in the railway business until the Government took over the railroads?

Mr. GOOD. Well, I will say to the gentleman that things were looking pretty blue about the time the roads were taken over. There was considerable disturbance, I think, at that time.

Mr. ESCH. In 1914, I think, 30 per cent of the railroad mileage was in the hands of receivers.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. We are to understand that coincident with the return of railroads to private ownership we must expect another increase of freight or passenger rates?

Mr. GOOD. That was the belief of Mr. Hines, the Director General of Railroads, and I think the country is to be congratulated in having so able a man as Mr. Hines as Director General of Railroads. I do not believe that a better man could be found anywhere for this very important position, and it is his opinion, supported by the conditions that have confronted him, that when the roads are turned back there will necessarily have to be an increase in the rates, in order that the roads can pay their operating expenses and anything like a fair return to the stockholders.

Mr. MILLER. Just one other question. Then, if I understand the gentleman's statement correctly, the net result will be that the freight rates will have been less under Government ownership than they will be under private ownership when the roads are returned to the private owners?

Mr. GOOD. Freight rates would have to be 10 per cent more in Federal control than they have been to make good the loss of $486,000,000 in operation. If his plan is carried out, there will have to be some additions to the present rates. But I want to say to the gentleman there are railroad executives who claim that if their roads were turned back to them they could operate them under the present rates and pay the present rates of wages and make money. Certainly many roads can not do this.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Is it not a fact that railroads which were operated at a profit immediately before being taken over by the Government were operated at a loss immediately following, under conditions practically the same, except the change in control?

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman that the committee did not go into the operation of any particular road. I am not informed as to that; and during the very brief time allotted to us for hearings we were compelled simply to get a picture of the Federal operation and of the obligations of the Government to the railroads, and have not analyzed at all the obligation of any particular road, except that of the New York, New Haven & Hartford and the Boston & Maine.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Is it not a fact that during the months in which there has been such a falling off in traffic compared with like months under private ownership the operating expenses were much smaller proportionately under private ownership than under Government ownership?

Mr. GOOD. Oh, yes; the operating expenses were increased over $1,000,000,000. There is no question about that. But, of course, the gentleman must remember that the wages were increased very materially, and about that time there came also an increase in the cost of materials.

Mr. HAUGEN. Much has been said about the deficiency and about the 200,000 additional employees added to the pay rolls. Is it not possible, by returning the roads to private ownership and by increasing their efficiency, that it may not be necessary to increase the freight charges, and that the charges may be reduced?

Mr. GOOD. I think unquestionably men do not perform the efficient service when they are working for the Government that they perform when they are working for corporations and individuals and when their opportunity for advancement depends on their record for efficiency. I think you will get a great deal more for your money when you operate under private ownership, and one of the reasons for this big deficit most certainly is Government operation. It is because of inefficiency of employees, for no matter who was Director General, or how efficient he was, he was bound to have a larger cost under Government control and operation. Now, I will have to decline to yield further.

Mr. HAUGEN. Just one more question.

Mr. GOOD. I will have to decline to yield now, until I can complete my remarks. Then, if I have any time, I will answer any other questions; but there are some matters that I think I ought to bring to the attention of the committee, and I know I will not have time to conclude what I should say to give you a picture of this matter. Pretty wide latitude will be given under the five-minute rule, so that all these matters can be thrashed out then.

Now, take the inland waterways, for instance. Under this provision of law the President was authorized to operate boats on the inland waterways, and we have an investment in inland waterways for last year, for equipment, of $2,646,686, and it is estimated that the improvements for 1919 will amount to $11,700,000. The deficit in operation of inland waterways last year was $1,143,358. The operating revenue of the inland waterways for last year was only $932,000, while the operating expense was $2,068,000. For every dollar the Government received to handle freight on inland waterways the Government had to pay out $2.25 to transport that freight.

Now, it is only fair to say, however, that this is an experiment, that the whole system was not in operation, and it is the opinion of the Director General that they ought to go ahead with this program and complete the purchase of ships and barges and the other equipment necessary for operation on the Warrior and Mississippi Rivers, on the Cape Cod Canal, and on the New York State Barge Canal until the end of Federal control.

It is the estimate of the Director General that if the operations of the inland waterways is a success there need not be very much loss in this equipment; but if it is not a success the whole investment of about $15,000,000 will result in additional loss to the Government. The Director General regards this as a practical experiment. It may lead to increased use of water transportation and it may result in ending expenditures for improving rivers and inland waterways.

Now, as I stated a few minutes ago, it is claimed by the Director General that we owe the railroads for 1918 $441,000,000. That is the balance due on rental. But the railroad companies owe the Railroad Administration $352,000,000. The only difficulty is that the railroads can not pay and the Government is required to pay. That amount involves a loan that was made to the New York, New Haven & Hartford, and in the estimates for this year there is an amount of $20,000,000 to be loaned to the Boston & Maine. But in arriving at the amount of $352,000,000 that the railroads owe the Railroad Administration for last year's operation, I desire to call the attention of the committee to this, that this sum is made up of a long list of items that the Railroad Administration has advanced to the various railroads for additions and betterments, and I think the Railroad Administration will be able to reduce that amount very materially. Of the $352,000,000 which has been advanced, I find, taking the roads now where advances of more than $10,000,000 have been made, the Railroad Administration has advanced to the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe $15,217,000, and I want to say that if the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co. can not finance its obligations to that extent for additions and betterments, then there are few financial institutions in the country that can be financed without Government appropriations.

Take the Chicago & North Western Railway Co., whose earnings on its capital stock, after paying all taxes and operating expenses, are more than $11 per share. I find it was proposed in 1918 to loan to the Chicago & North Western Railway Co. $14,000,000. Take the Illinois Central, again, a railroad that is absolutely sound financially. And yet in the $352,000,000 which we have advanced to the railroads for 1918 is $14,363,000 loaned to the Illinois Central.

Take the New York Central Railroad Co. For 1918 it was proposed to have the Government continue to carry them for additions and betterments for 1918 to the extent of $32,000,000. I undertake to say that it is not necessary for the Government to carry these large sums for these strong railroad companies, and I take issue with any man who claims that it is absolutely necessary for Congress to appropriate now $1,200,000,000 in order that the Government in turn shall loan millions upon millions of dollars to these strong railroads that can go and borrow the money just as well as the Government can borrow the money. The Government must not monopolize the money market.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman from South Carolina yield me five minutes?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. GOOD. I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the Government during these payments is called upon to do unusual things. We are asked here to appropriate $1,200,000,000, and in determining what amount we shall appropriate I say to you we must have some regard for the Treasury of the United States.

I have here the daily statement of the United States Treasury for June 6, 1919. I find by that statement that there was a net balance on hand of $1,702,000,000, but that item refers to another item in which the Secretary states that against that there is outstanding to the credit of disbursing officers and agents $1,759,178,000. If all of the outstanding amounts in the hands of the disbursing officers had been paid on that date, there would have been no balance in the Treasury, but there would have been a deficit of $46,249,666.60.

Oh, gentlemen say that we will have a large amount coming in within a few days; that a billion and a half will be received in income taxes. I call attention to the fact that on June 9 we had outstanding in Treasury certificates of indebtedness to the banks of the United States $5,229,000,000. We have collected from the fifth liberty loan $2,996,000,000, leaving to come in from the fifth liberty loan a balance of only $1,536,699,858.

After all of the fifth liberty loan is received and the proceeds thereof used to retire outstanding certificates of indebtedness, there will be outstanding and owing the banks of the United States, in the form of certificates of indebtedness, $3,692,000,000, and we have coming in on June 15 a billion and a half with which to pay the banks $3,692,000,000.

Now, when the committee reported out this amount it was in full realization that the War Finance Corporation, that has already advanced the Railroad Administration and various railroads about $200,000,000, would still be in existence with $700,000,000 assets and able at all times to help the railroad companies and the Railroad Administration.

We must keep in mind the Treasury of the United States. Having these things in mind, realizing that this Congress will be in session until snow flies, it is the deliberate judgment of your committee that we could well afford now to appropriate for the immediate necessities of the Railroad Administration, leaving until some later date the supplying of such additional sums as the actual circumstances may require, when we will have a more complete understanding in regard to the operation of the railroads and the actual needs of the Railroad Administration. I have no doubt that the patriotism of the membership of this House will always rise to the necessities and see to it that the credit of the United States is maintained at all hazards. [Applause.] And when the time comes, as I have no doubt it will come, within the next few months, when an additional appropriation will be necessary, the committee and Congress will respond to the actual needs. For the present it is the judgment of your committee that $750,000,000 can not be expended by the Railroad Administration within the next three or four months, unless there is waste and extravagance in its expenditure. Therefore I feel under all considerations Congress can not afford at this time to appropriate $1,200,000,000, and that the amount carried by the bill—$750,000,000—will amply take care of present needs. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, while I agree with much that has been said by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] I can not agree with his concluding statement that the Railway Administration at this time does not need more than $750,000,000, and that Congress can not appropriate a larger sum without inviting waste and extravagance on the part of the Railway Administration.

I recall to your minds that in the closing days of the last Congress the Appropriations Committee unanimously reported a deficiency bill appropriating $750,000,000 to care for the immediate necessities of the Railway Administration. This House unanimously passed that bill. Since that time the reports for the first four months of the year show a deficit of $250,000,000, so that without appropriating a dollar for working capital the Railway Administration needs $1,000,000,000. By our failure to appropriate this amount at this time the administration will be unable to pay what it owes to the railroads, and the railroads will in turn be unable to pay their past due obligations. This statement, I think, should be made so that the country will not be misled into the belief that by this appropriation we are properly caring for the financial needs of the Railway Administration. I know that we are not, that we are seriously embarrassing the Railway Administration, and that within the next 30 or 60 days this Congress will be forced to appropriate additional money to provide for their necessities.

Some gentlemen have indulged in criticism of the Government for ever having taken possession of the railroads. Personally I am opposed to the Government owning and operating the railroads of this country. I know, however, that the railroads were taken over not in time of peace but in time of war, and that it was absolutely necessary to take charge of them to successfully prosecute the war. Let me recall to you the conditions existing in 1917. The Congress had on August 29, 1916, unanimously authorized the President in an emergency to take charge of the railroads. We entered the war in April, 1917. We knew that every other nation engaged in the war had found it necessary to take charge of its railroads. Notwithstanding this, the President did not exercise the power vested in him until December, 1917. The railroads then were in a very embarrassing situation. There was great congestion of the railroad lines at every port on the Atlantic seaboard, and for miles and miles the tracks were blocked with freight cars. The railroads were being forced to pay increased prices for materials and supplies. They had already granted an increased wage to some of their employees. They had not been allowed any increase in freight rates, and their financial situation was deplorable. They found themselves unable to borrow money except at excessive rates of interest, because the Government was in the market, having floated during 1917 $6,000,000,000 worth of Liberty bonds. They knew that further issues would be floated in 1918. They were traveling the road to bankruptcy. In addition to this, the railroad employees demanded a substantial increase in wages, basing their demands upon the increased cost of living, threatening in case their demands were refused to inaugurate a nation-wide strike on January 1. To save the situation and to continue in full operation this end of our line of communication, there was nothing for the President to do but take charge of the railroads. You may differ with me as to the wisdom of his course, but the fact remains that he did take charge of them, and that is the essential fact in the consideration of the pending measure.

Now, some gentlemen who admit the necessity for taking over the railroads criticize the Railroad Administration once they were taken over, and the financial statement considered at this time furnishes the basis for this criticism. Therefore let us consider this statement. The Railroad Administration was originally granted $500,000,000. They now ask for $1,200,000,000, making a total of $1,700,000,000. This money has been spent and will be spent in the following manner:

Total amount of investment which can not immediately be paid by the railroads	$774, 473, 174
Investment in waterways in 1918	2, 641, 886
Investment in waterways in 1919	11, 700, 000
Grand total investment	788, 815, 060
Total deficit	486, 184, 940
Working capital	425, 000, 000

Of the total amount appropriated, $486,000,000 represents the loss to the taxpayers. The rest of the appropriation is, in the opinion of the Director General and the Director of Finance, secured and will be returned whenever the railroads are returned to their owners, and the amount advanced by the Government will then be returned to the Treasury. In the opinion of the Director General, the loss from moneys advanced will be infinitesimal.

Taking this statement, let us in fairness to the Railway Administration consider the circumstances under which the deficit was incurred. Of the total $486,000,000, the loss in 1918 was $236,000,000. As I stated a few minutes ago, when we took charge of the railroads we inherited from the private owners a threatened strike of railroad employees. To avert this disaster the Director General agreed with the employees to submit to a commission the question of what wage increase, if any, should be granted and agreed that any increase granted should be made retroactive, taking effect as of January 1. That commission was composed of the Hon. Franklin K. Lane, Interstate Commerce Commissioner McChord, Judge Harry Covington, and Mr. Wilcox, formerly chairman of the Public Service Commission of New York. In May they announced their decision, indicating that the cost of living had advanced more than railroad wages, and recommended a substantial increase in wages. The Director General states that the average increase of wages of employees amounts to 52 per cent. This average includes the increase of wages of some employees subsequently made, but the important fact is that the substantial increase in wages resulting from the decision of this board operated from January 1 and there was no increase in freight and passenger rates until July 1.

Now, entirely apart from this wage question, the railroads in 1917 were confronted with one of the severest winters ever witnessed in this country. It handicapped them in their operations. Again, the draft took from them some of their efficient employees for military service, while many of their old and trained employees were taken to operate the railroad system constructed in France. At the same time the shipping industries and munition plants, paying higher wages, were taking from the railroads some of their most efficient operatives. Thus it will be seen they operated under great difficulties. Having received the increased revenue for only 6 months, and having paid the increased wage for 12 months, they naturally incurred a deficit of $236,000,000.

Now, as to the deficit of $250,000,000 which was incurred during the first four months of this year. Up to the signing of the armistice the organization of the railroads was geared up to full capacity. They were prepared for the continuance of the extraordinary demands made upon them during the war. With the signing of the armistice there was an immediate reduction in the transportation of war supplies. It was not until January, however, that the volume of business began to show such a great decrease. In addition to the loss of war supplies there were many plants in the country which had been engaged in the manufacture of munitions and which had not yet been transformed for the production of what I may call "peace commodities."

Then there was coal. Coal constitutes about one-third of the freight transported by the railroads of this country. Before the signing of the armistice, encouraged, doubtless, by the appeals of the Fuel Administration, the people had stored supplies of coal, both for industrial and domestic purposes. With the signing of the armistice the people naturally refrained from placing any orders except those that were urgent, because they anticipated a reduction in the price of coal. Again, unlike the winter of 1918, this year we had one of the mildest winters of my recollection, and coal was not in such great demand. As a result there was a decrease of 14 per cent in the volume of business handled by the railroads, and this decrease in the volume of business is responsible for the deficit of $250,000,000.

Now, I think you will agree with me that it makes no difference whether the railroads had been operated under private ownership or by the Railway Administration this deficit could not have been avoided. In proof of that it should be stated that, while the Railway Administration was nominally in control of the railroads during the first four months of 1918, as a matter of fact they did not interfere with the operation of the roads by the private owners, and during this four months, without taking any increased wage into consideration, the railroads under private ownership lost $105,000,000. At the end of that time the Railway Administration took charge, and with the exception of two or three railroads they appointed to manage the railroads the same officials who had operated these roads under private ownership. So that as a matter of fact any criticism of the Railway Administration on the ground of inefficiency is a criticism of the railroad officials who owned and operated the railroads prior to governmental control.

Now, with reference to the wage question. There has been much criticism of the administration on this score. I want to call your attention to the fact referred to by Mr. Hines, that while the average increase of wages of railroad employees was 52 per cent, Judge Gary of the Steel Corporation, states the increase in the labor cost in the production of steel has increased 128 per cent. You and I know that there has been an equally large increase in the wages paid to the employees engaged in the shipbuilding industries, munition plants, and even upon the farms of the Nation. Now, in all seriousness, could we expect railroad employees, in view of the increased cost of living, to be satisfied with the wage they were receiving? Is it not apparent to all of us that if the increase had not been granted every efficient employee would have gone into other fields of endeavor? It is peculiar but nevertheless true, that we expect more of certain classes of employees and of certain industries. Why I recall that when the increase of rates was announced we all howled, but as a matter of fact everything the Government touched during the war increased even more than did the railroad rates. We increased the postal rates 50 per cent, and there was but mild complaint. By fixing a price, we increased the price of coal, of flour, and of many other commodities more than passenger and freight rates were increased, and yet no increase has aroused as much criticism as has the increase of railroad rates.

Now, this brings me to a discussion of whether or not there should be an increase of rates to cover the deficit. I am satisfied that the Director General, Mr. Hines, is too optimistic in hoping that from now until the end of the year he can break even. He expresses the hope that the great crops now in sight and a general improvement of business will so increase the volume of freight as to enable them to escape incurring any further deficit. But I know that the crops will not begin to move for several months; that June, July, and August are lean months in the railroad world, and I am satisfied we are going to have an additional deficit for these months. But I am in accord with him in the belief that it would be unwise at this time to increase the rates. He advances this reason, that any increase of rates based upon the deficit of the four months of this year, which was due to the extraordinary situation incident to the readjustment of business conditions, would be a much greater increase than would be justified under normal conditions, and thus be exceedingly unfair to shippers. He further argues, and with great force, that railroad rates are basic and that any increase at this time would increase the price of all commodities and thus increase the cost of living to the masses of the people. His opinion is that no increase should be granted until normal conditions have been reached and there is an opportunity to intelligently decide what increase, if any, is necessary.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I will.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. What security have we that we will ever be able to recover the amount that we have advanced to the roads in bank accounts?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I do not know exactly to what the gentleman refers. If he has reference to the two items in the financial statement, the loans to the New York, New Haven & Hartford and the Boston & Maine railroads, he will find in the hearings a list of the securities which are offered, and which, in the opinion of the Director of Finance, will be ample security in case these loans are made. As to other moneys advanced to the railroads, the Government will in every instance be able to protect itself, either by deductions from standard returns, by materials and supplies, or by other security.

Reference has been made to the advances made by the Railroad Administration for the purchase of equipment. The amount asked for additions and betterments for the year 1919, to be paid for by the Railroad Administration, is $253,000,000. The balance of the additions and betterments is to be paid by the railroads themselves. Of the $253,000,000, $245,000,000 is for equipment which has already been ordered, so that there is really but $8,000,000 for additions and betterments over and above the amount due for equipment. As to the immediate necessity for money for this purpose, I call your attention to the fact that the hearings, on page 128, show 100,000 cars ordered, delivery to be completed by October 1. Fifty-two thousand of them have already been delivered. One thousand nine hundred and thirty locomotives have been ordered, deliveries to be completed by December 1; of these 1,257 have been delivered. Now, the gentleman from Iowa is of the opinion that as some of these locomotives and cars are not to be delivered immediately the money is not needed.

The fact is, however, that they are not paid for when delivered, but payments are made as the work progresses, the amount of payment being based upon percentage of completion, and my information is that some equipment due for delivery in May has not been delivered because payments have not been made. As a further instance of how badly the Railway Administration is in need of money at this time, let me state the situation as to the compensation due the railroads. We owed the railroads $78,000,000 a month, which for five months would be practically $400,000,000. We paid them on this account during the first two months $56,000,000. We gave certificates of indebtedness of $186,000.000, making a total of $242,000,000 paid, and leaving a balance due on this score of $158,000,000.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I am sorry that I can not do so because I will have to give way to others. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] criticized the administration for having ordered equipment which the railroads do not now desire to accept on the ground that they do not need it. The gentleman forgets, however, that this equipment was ordered during the war. The same criticism he makes of the Railroad Administration he might make of the War Department for having placed orders for machine guns, rifles, and ammunition which we do not now need. Unfortunately, we could not know that the war would end on November 11, but if the Railway Administration had failed to place orders for sufficient equipment, and the war had continued, and because of the shortage of equipment the railroads were unable to handle the situation, the gentleman from Illinois would have been one of the first to criticize the Railway Administration for failure to order this equipment.

Now, the same gentlemen say the railroads should not be made to take this equipment. The railroads in 1917 faced bankruptcy. The Government took them over. It guaranteed them compensation during the time they were in the hands of the Railroad Administration, and the railways of this country received a benefit that other public-service corporations did not receive. Street car companies and other corporations have been forced to go out and with great difficulty attempt to finance themselves. They never received the aid of the Government, while the railroads have been running on a guaranty. Now they come in and say they do not want the equipment. They want the Government to take it and at the end of Government control sell the equipment to them for little or nothing. But the Railroad Administration does not agree with this policy, and they are allocating the equipment to the various railroads, but they are not awarding cars and locomotives that are not suited to the roads, notwithstanding statements which have been made to that effect.

Now, with reference to the ability of the railroads to finance themselves at this time. The gentleman who has just preceded me said they ought to go out in the market and borrow. You know off-handed, to a man not accustomed to borrowing hundreds of millions of dollars, that certainly sounded reasonable to me. I have never represented a railroad or tried to borrow a billion or a million dollars, and I have to take the word of the gentlemen in charge of the matter. I have great confidence in the Director of Finance, and his statement is that the railroads are not able to finance themselves. They could finance themselves in some few instances in the case of the more prosperous roads, but using his language, "taking them by and large," they can not well finance themselves for long-term loans, except at an exorbitant rate of interest.

Now, what is the province of the Railway Administration? Why, if the Georgia Central Railroad, for instance, goes to New York to borrow money and agrees to pay 8 per cent for a period of 10 years, a man might say, "That is purely a business matter concerning only the Georgia Central Railroad and the bankers." But the fact is that if the Georgia Central Railroad pays the National City Bank of New York 8 per cent, that boosts the interest rate to every borrower, and everybody who wants to borrow money has to pay an increased rate.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. What interest rates do they pay to the Government of the United States on what we appropriate?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Six per cent on all advances to them.

Mr. MADDEN. On a great part of it no interest is paid, but on these loans it is.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Interest is paid on all money advanced on account of the railroads. But returning to my statement, the Railway Administration will not approve a loan to a railroad which seeks to borrow money and pay interest at the rate of 8 per cent, because when it pays 8 per cent interest it thereby means a loss finally either to the Treasury or to the taxpayer, because that amount of money will be accounted for in arriving at its net earnings. The more interest you pay out the less the net revenues are, and the less the net revenues the greater the deficit; and the greater the deficit the more money you have to appropriate or the more money the shipper will finally have to pay in an increase of rates. Therefore, whenever a loan is made at an exorbitant rate, the Director of Finance, exercising the power vested in him, will not approve it, and frequently the War Finance Corporation steps in, and in order to prevent the railroads from being charged excessive interest rates by the banks of the country will lend to them, charging 6 per cent interest if the security is good, and thus they stabilize the market.

Now, boiling down the situation, I care not how you discuss it, it goes back to this: This House was satisfied last February that $750,000,000 was necessary to enable the Railway Administration to meet its obligations. Now we are $250,000,000 additional in the hole. In addition to that, the railways ask for $225,000,000 for working capital. You ought to know, and the country ought to know, that we are not going to give them that $250,000,000 to pay this deficit, and we are not going to give them a dollar to use as working capital. Well, some man will say, "Even if that be true, and you do not give them that, they will get along without it." They can get along only because they will not pay their debts. The effect of that will be that they can not economically run the railroads of the country. As business men, you and I know that if you have the cash on hand when you go to buy supplies you can get those supplies in the market at a lower price than you can when you go to buy supplies and the man from whom you try to buy them knows you can not pay cash; that you can only give him certificates of indebtedness, as the Railway Administration is doing to-day. They have out $186,000,000 certificates of indebtedness. Those certificates are drawing interest at 5 per cent, and when they could not negotiate them we had to guarantee them 1 per cent additional.

If they had the cash they could pay their bills, and the supplies could be bought for lower prices, and the business of the railroads could be run more economically than it can be run when they have no working capital on hand. Now, think of it! It costs $360,000,000 a month to operate the railroads of this country. They ask for $425,000,000 for working capital. That includes $140,000,000 in the hands of conductors and agents. Take the $140,000,000 from the $425,000,000 which they ask, and it leaves them asking for $285,000,000, or less than the cost of operating the roads for a single month, to use as working capital.

Mr. MADDEN. And they carry a certain amount in the hands of local treasurers.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. That takes into account every cent they have. If the gentleman will look at page 24 of the hearings he will see a detailed statement of the figures I have just given, showing that a sum less than the cost of operating the railroads for a month would be in the hands of the railroads if you gave them what they asked; and we are not doing that. They have $202,000,000 net excess of current assets over current liabilities, and ask for $223,000,000, which would make $425,000,000 for working capital.

Well, you say, what is going to be the result? The result will be that the Railway Administration is not going to be able to pay the railroads, and the railroads will be unable to pay their debts. Gentlemen say, "Oh, the War Finance Corporation will be able to take care of them."

They may, and they may not. That is their statement to the committee. They say they have to stabilize the Liberty bond market. The War Finance Corporation has on hand at this time, according to its statement, $35,000,000, and it has available $150,000,000. Now, with that $150,000,000 and the $35,000,000 they have to stabilize the bond market; if the banks try to hold up the railroads and make them pay a greatly increased rate of interest, as I have described to you, then they have to step in and stabilize that market.

Then the last Congress passed an act to stimulate exports, an act the purpose of which was to enable us to go into foreign markets, and by making advances to the exporters, stimulate trade at the conclusion of the war. By that act we placed upon the War Finance Corporation the duty of making these advances, and they have to make them out of this $150,000,000 and that cash on hand of $35,000,000, and yet you expect the War Finance Corporation to advance all of this money for the railroads. It can not be done. Gentlemen say, "Why, if we do not give it to them, they will just have to do it." But the War Finance Corporation will not be able to do it and also attend to its proper function of stabilizing the Liberty bond market, this railroad security market, and advance the money for the stimulation of exports.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. How much time have I, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 13 minutes remaining.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I regret that I have not time to yield. I wish to finish my statement.

Mr. MADDEN. Will it trouble the gentleman if I ask how much of the original——

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I am sorry that I can not yield to the gentleman from Illinois, because I have refused to yield to my friend from Michigan.

Now, the gentleman from Iowa urges as an excuse for not reporting a larger appropriation the fact that the Treasury has not to-day sufficient cash available to take care of a larger appropriation. Well, as a matter of fact, the Treasury statement that he read proved that every argument used against a greater appropriation is equally true as to the $750,000,000 appropriation which he advocates. The truth is that any appropriation you might make for the Railway Administration, whether it be $750,000,000 as he advocates or $1,200,000,000 that the Railway Administration requests, it will be met just as will be the appropriations you hereafter make for the Army, Navy, and all other purposes. In a few days the income and excess-profit taxes will be coming into the Treasury. Whenever the Treasury finds itself without sufficient funds they will issue certificates of indebtedness. The gentleman from Iowa argues that instead of the Treasury taking care of the needs of the Railway Administration, that it should be forced to appeal to the War Finance Corporation. Well, the War Finance Corporation, if it attempts to take care of the needs, will have to sell bonds, which will amount to the same thing as the Treasury issuing certificates of indebtedness, because the War Finance Corporation is only an agency of the Government.

Now, I take this position: The party in power has, through this committee, refused to appropriate more than $750,000,000, when the Railway Administration has proved that it will require $1,200,000,000 to take care of its immediate necessities. The result is that the Railway Administration is going to be seriously handicapped in its effort to economically administer the railroads of this country. I know that the party in power has taken this position in an effort to establish a record for economy, but I know that it is false economy. I know that the failure to provide sufficient working capital will make it impossible for the railroads to be operated as economically as if they were placed in a position to pay their bills. I know, furthermore, that the thought, the time, and the energy that could be devoted to the economical administration of the business of the railroads will have to be devoted to an effort to tide over the financial situation confronting them by reason of the failure to provide sufficient funds to take care of their immediate needs. I know that the failure to provide sufficient funds will seriously embarrass the industries of this country who have either furnished or are under contract to furnish equipment to the railroads, and I think the country should know that this is the true situation; and I am satisfied that within the next three months the business interests of this country will demand of the party in power that they do what they to-day are failing to do, namely, appropriate sufficient funds to take care of the needs of the railroads of this country.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 10 minutes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I have no other request for time.

Mr. BLANTON. May I have that?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, by reason of the fact that the legislative body in the other end of the Capitol has placed a rider on the deficiency appropriation bill I take it that it would be apropos to read the following document:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 9, 1919.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
United States Representative, City.

DEAR SIR: Answering, as requested, in detail your specific inquiries, will state:

My name is Charles H. Burroughs; live at 221 B Street NE.; am now one of the auditors in the United States Shipping Board, employed in room 1046, Munsey Building, Washington, D. C.

First, I would like to state that in answering your inquiries I am not volunteering information; that I am dependent upon my position for a livelihood, and hope that you will not cause me to lose my position with the Government.

You are correct in stating that formerly I was Chief of Transportation and Revolving Fund Section of the United States Employment Service. I voluntarily left such position.

Relative to your inquiry concerning record of travel vouchers of Special Representative Luther C. Steward for the months of July, August, September, October, November, and December, 1918, wherein Mr. Steward claimed and there was allowed to him for travel expense: For July, $134.45; for August, $127.25; for September, $87.50; for October, $113.25; for November, $120.50; and for December, 1918, $127.50, per vouchers numbered, respectively, 197, 2450, 6248, 9656, 14331, and 18495. I am familiar with such departmental matters. Numerous parties connected with the service were furnished with transportation books containing printed requests and stubs in same, and such parties would present such requests, filled out by them, to the railroads and get transportation, and their books, with the stubs, were supposed to be returned to the department. The claim of Mr. Steward was in addition to such transportation furnished by the railroad. Thousands of dollars were absolutely wasted in this way. I doubt whether one-third of these books were ever returned and filed with the department. It can not be shown that it was necessary for Mr. Steward to make these trips. He was receiving in the neighborhood of $3,500 or more from the Government and at the same time drew about $2,750 from the Employees Union, and for a time at least his wife worked in the Munition Building at about $1,100. If this service is properly audited it will be found that thousands of vouchers were issued in irregular and unnecessary transportation, and it will also be found that there were numerous details made from stations merely to enable parties to draw their $4 per diem in addition to their salaries and travel transportation. It was wholly unnecessary for Mr. Hibbard and Mr. Harry H. Stone to take that expensive trip to France. Mr. Harry S. Parks took many unnecessary trips at great expense. Relative to the transportation voucher and three Pullman tickets issued to Miss Jeannette Densmore, sister of the director general, from New York to Atlantic City on July 4, 1918, and the return by Miss Densmore from Atlantic City to New York on July 7, 1918, will state that is only one of hundreds of such trips such agents took on the expense of the Government. In my opinion, the business management of the whole department was rotten. Answering your inquiry, will state that, in my judgment, had Congress allowed the proposed $10,000,000 appropriation requested in February that at least two-thirds of same would have been wasted. It would be a waste of public money for Congress to allow this United States Employment Service any more appropriations until the whole service has been properly audited and investigated and reorganized on proper business lines. It has been continually stated that much has been done and is being done for the returning soldier. Reports of this work are padded and is mostly propaganda, as I do not believe that returning soldiers have received any benefit from the great bulk of the enormous expenditures wasted by this service. I was absolutely disgusted with the system and practice.

Answering your inquiry, I believe that you can depend upon Mr. J. Stuart Brand, of 1477 Newton Street NW., and Mr. J. E. Leemon, now employed by the Federal income tax, to tell what they know about this service.

If the department is properly investigated, Congress will be astounded at the revelation awaiting accounting.

Very sincerely, yours,

CHARLES H. BURROUGHS.

P. S.—If you can get him to do so, Mr. Lynn could give you some very valuable information.

I want to state that I believe that this Congress will protect this auditor of the Government in giving this information, not voluntarily, but given at the request of one of the representatives of the people in this Congress, who asked him the specific questions which he answered. If an attempt is made in injure this Government employee, or if an attempt is made to make this auditor lose his position by reason of the information given, I for one hope that this Congress will see to it that he does not lose his position with the Government by having done his duty as he sees it.

Now, I want to read another document, inasmuch as I say on an appropriation bill, when this House refused to do it, the body at the other end of the Capitol has seen fit, according to its usual custom, to place a rider on the bill and send it back here, where we will have little opportunity to resist such action:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 9, 1919.

MY DEAR MR. BLANTON: While I am willing to tell a congressional committee what I know concerning the waste of public money in the United States Employment Service, I would prefer for you not to make my name public, as I am dependent upon employment for a living.

With regard to your inquiry, will state that it is my firm belief that it would be almost impossible for any person not a member of some union to obtain desirable employment through this service, as that is almost one of the first questions asked, "Are you a member of the union, and, if not, are you willing to join the Employees' Union?" I do hope that Congress will not give this service another dollar until it has been properly investigated. I will go before any committee, if my evidence is necessary, to assist the administration in cleaning up this department.

Very truly,

_____.

This letter is signed by this employee, with address given in this city; but I will not disclose it, as I was requested to keep it confidential; but I am authorized to give the name and address to a committee.

Now, I want to say that if this Congress knew just how much money this particular employment service had spent in my district alone in propaganda through the newspapers and by telegrams sent to every chamber of commerce and to every newspaper in my district within the last four months you would be astounded at the useless waste of money by any department.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to say that I have introduced in this Congress a resolution appointing Charles W. Roberts, an expert auditor, to audit the finances of this United States Employment Service. If you appoint Mr. Roberts, not at a tremendous salary, but at $400 a month, I will guarantee that within four months he will produce evidence as it exists, and I will guarantee that the evidence will astound you when he brings it before Congress.

I know of auditing that he did that helped to cause 12 felony indictments to be brought against a county judge in the district over which I presided for eight years as circuit judge. A culprit is now a fugitive from justice in South America, where he has been several years. I should like to see the Congress give an opportunity to this man, in whom I have complete confidence, and I know he would make an honest audit of the department's finances and advise us what became of this five and one-half million dollars which we have permitted by our action to be expended under blanket appropriations.

I hope the committee that has charge of this resolution will take immediate action by reporting and passing it, and let us have an auditing of these accounts before we appropriate another dollar for this service. I am willing to go as far as any man in this House to inaugurate and provide a proper United States Employment Service, available alike for every laborer, but we can not do it in unrestricted blanket appropriations and riders on appropriation bills.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired, and the Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for carrying out the act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918, there is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $750,000,000, which shall be in addition to the appropriation of $500,000,000 made in section 6 of said act, and shall be subject in all respects to the same authority for, and restriction of, expenditure as the said $500,000,000.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. It is not my intention to detain the House long—I could not if I would, except by unanimous consent.

In March last, shortly before the adjournment, the House of Representatives passed a bill in substance similar to this bill, after much investigation, upon the request of the Director General of Railroads, on regular estimates. Seven hundred and fifty million dollars was what he desired at that time. The bill failed in the Senate. This is the 10th of June. Congress was called into extra session on the 19th day of May last. What might have happened if we had been called together on the 10th of March I do not know. That water has run over the dam. We came together on the 19th of May. I am not here to criticize at this time what happened during this war. The war is not legally over. I do not know when it will be legally over, for I do not know when the treaty of peace may be ratified, if it is ratified by the Senate of the United States. I do know that we have been notified by the President that the railroads will be turned back on the 1st of January next to their owners, and whatever happens, that will require a settlement of accounts as between the United States, represented by the Director of Railroads, and the respective railroads. Some of the railroads will have claims coming to Congress of the United States when most of us are with the angels. I refer now to the short-line railroads. I shall not enter into that part of the discussion, but it ought to be possible between now and the 1st of January next, or a short time thereafter, to settle with the first-class railroads.

I was on the subcommittee on deficiencies that made that investigation of which I speak and reported the bill in the last Congress. Mr. Sherley at that time was the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and the chairman of the subcommittee on deficiencies. Because that bill failed the Railroad Administration, the railroads, and to a considerable extent, incidentally, the people of the country, the business people, the producing people, the consuming people, were put to considerable trouble. The result was that the Director of Railroads devised a new form of certificate, a copy of which you will find in the back part of the hearings which were held at this session before this committee, being in general a statement that the Government owed this railroad so much and that railroad so much, issuing to them a certificate without date for payment, that certificate bearing 5 per cent interest, so that the railroads were able to go to the bankers, or to the Finance Corporation—and my recollection is from the evidence they went to both—and borrowed the money with the certificate as collateral. Most of the money that was borrowed by the railroads was money owing to them by the Government, which the Government did not have the money to pay. Therefore these certificates were devised.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. I am not going to undertake a long explanation, for it would take five hours to do it, if I had the knowledge and the ability to do it. Congress met in extra session. The Director General of Railroads appeared before the Congress, and there were extensive hearings. From those hearings I want to read very briefly a statement which caused me to assent to the present bill and which will explain why I favored the appropriation that was passed by the Democratic House in March last but failed in the Democratic Senate. The chairman of the committee, Mr. GOOD, asked Mr. Hines the following question:

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Hines, when you estimated for $750,000,000 for the deficit for 1918, to take care of contracts with the railroad companies and to pay them their return and to pay for the equipment, of course, that was with the full knowledge that Congress would adjourn on the 4th of March and would not meet again until next December, unless sooner convened by the President. What condition would you have been in if the appropriation had been made and there had been no session of Congress until next December—you would have been able to conduct the roads in an efficient way, would you not?

To that question Mr. Hines replied as follows:

Mr. HINES. I think that if there had been no session of Congress prior to December as things have turned out and this deficit had developed, even larger than I had in mind—

And a deficit much larger than he had in mind did develop—

we would have been very greatly hampered in carrying on the situation the latter part of this year. We would have been decidedly embarrassed in doing so.

Mr. Chairman, I admit that there was a larger deficit in the first quarter of the year than he estimated for, when the former bill was passed early in March. Everyone understands that the first quarter of the year, passing in the winter under all of the conditions in the country, is the lean quarter for railway earnings, because there is less transportation and less business for the railroads. In the remainder of the year, especially in the last half of the year, the receipts greatly increase. The crops are moved and from all accounts, thank God, we may expect bountiful crops this year. So that the $750,000,000 will not be expended immediately. The earnings of the railroads themselves will be subject to expenditure, coming as they will in the latter half of June, in increased amount, in July, in August, September, and October, and we have every reason to believe that the business will be at least equal to what it was in 1917, and in 1917 the receipts almost doubled in those months over the receipts for the first quarter of that year. Those earnings will be available for the use of the Director General.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] said that we will be here until the snow flies. Yes, we will; and until the snow melts, next spring. I will say to the Director General, a gentleman in whom I have great confidence from a business standpoint, that he will get the money. I agree with all of the compliments that have been paid to him. He will have a chance, if necessary, to appear before us again. If the earnings of the railways, when the crops begin to move, double, he will not need any great additional appropriation, if he needs any. Let us wait and see.

Is that a sound policy to pursue? I think it is. While the war is not legally over, it is for ordinary purposes. Our boys are coming back, and the railroads are to be turned back on the 1st of January. We are to take an account of stock; and all war measures for wholesale or retail expenditure, except to meet the obligations of Uncle Sam, ought to cease. My God! we do not want any more cantonments built; we do not want any more enormous expenditures made in time of peace which were necessary in time of war. We do not want anything done except what is necessary to square accounts and pay what we owe, including care for our soldiers and their dependents. If we have not the money to pay Uncle Sam's debts, we will borrow it or raise it by taxation.

The appropriation of $750,000,000 failing in March compelled the Director General to arrange for obtaining that amount of money on credit, which was legally done, and this bill, when enacted, will protect the credit that was given. The Director General cooperated with the railways, the banks, and with the War Finance Corporation in the premises. In my judgment, all this was legally and successfully accomplished, and this appropriation will close the transaction.

Mr. Chairman, so far as I know, the War Finance Corporation has stabilized the value of Uncle Sam's bonds on the market in large degree.

Uncle Sam is the only stockholder in this corporation. Capital, $500,000,000; $350,000,000 of this has been utilized, and there is still $150,000,000 available. The corporation has about $40,000,000 to its credit. All this appears from the hearings.

Mr. MADDEN. And if my colleague will allow me, they have the power to issue $4,000,000,000 worth of securities?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly; they have got that power. Now, then, let me tell you another reason, among many others, why I do not want anything further done that would aid, further than the law now does, the Finance Corporation. I should say, "You have done very good work, but now you have power to do what I want you to do, and possibly you are proceeding to get ready to do it."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois be allowed to conclude his remarks.

Mr. CANNON. I think I can get through in a very short time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois be permitted to conclude his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. The Finance Corporation under the original act goes out of business, except to close up affairs. It can not make any further obligations six months after the treaty of peace is signed. There was an amendment passed to that act that enabled the Finance Corporation to finance corporations or to act as banker to make arrangements to encourage exports from the United States anywhere in the world. Now, I picked up a newspaper the other day—I have forgotten, but I think it was the New York Times or some other paper—and there was a statement that New York capitalists were very seriously considering the proposition, with their own money, forming their own corporation, to do exactly that thing. Now, whether it is a wise thing to do or not, I do not know, but if you will turn to page 283 of the hearings—let me read from the statement of Mr. McLean, who seems to be a most intelligent gentleman, who is a director on that board:

Mr. MCLEAN. Yes; where we could do so within the spirit of the law. There is one other thing, Mr. Chairman, that you have not referred to, and that is the amendment to the act by which we were authorized to try and stimulate exports from this country. Up to the present time we have not made any actual loans under that amendment, but our managing director is now in Europe for the purpose of looking into that situation and meeting representatives of the governments which will probably become our customers, in order to see what can be done to carry out that provision of the act.

The CHAIRMAN. You have not made any loans for that purpose?

Mr. MCLEAN. We have not.

Mr. BYRNES. Under the act you go out of business six months after the treaty of peace is signed?

Mr. MCLEAN. As to all of the ordinary business of the corporation, except the export business, as I understand it; we would cease doing new business six months after the declaration of peace as promulgated by the President.

Mr. BYRNES. If that is so, who is going to collect these loans?

Mr. MCLEAN. That limitation is only for the purpose of restricting new business. We would, of course, remain in existence——

Mr. BYRNES (interposing). You would remain in existence longer than six months after the treaty of peace was signed, but thereafter you would make no loans?

Mr. MCLEAN. No; except under this new provision to stimulate exports, because I believe under that act we can proceed for 12 months after the signing of the peace treaty.

Now, I announced what I believed was a sound policy in my first 5 minutes or my first 10 minutes. I do not want the Finance Corporation, I do not want any other commission in existence authorized by the Government, to act for the Government and obligate Uncle Sam for any new projects. [Applause.] Let us get back to the normal. Now, the Finance Corporation has the power to advance money to the railroads, has the power to make loans, and it has made loans on these certificates. I do not want to weaken that power, because that is dealing with what Uncle Sam is bound to deal with and bound to pay. I do not want any new obligations. Therefore, as we meet every day substantially from now for months to come, I want to wait and see, and it will not take a great while if they need more money to pass another act giving the Railway Administration more money, and for that reason I voted for the $750,000,000 appropriation. I did not quite understand my friend from Georgia, whom I greatly appreciate and——

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The gentleman means the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. CANNON. I will not say I beg Georgia's pardon [laughter]; it was a slip of the tongue, for I have very high respect for him, for his character, and great ability; but he says he will not submit an amendment to increase this $750,000,000 to a billion dollars, although he thinks a billion dollars is needed. And while I am neither glad nor sorry because he does not submit it, I think he aimed to lay a foundation for an "I told you so" in the event we have to appropriate $200,000,000 or $400,000,000 for that purpose. But, after all, I have no objection to his not offering that amendment. I do not believe the committee would agree to it. Certainly not if they agree with me, and I have made such a statement of facts after consideration as will enable them to see that the reasons that have been advanced by the gentleman from Iowa, the chairman of the committee, are such as we had better pass the bill as it is reported.

Gentlemen, may I say in conclusion, not particularly referring to this bill more than to other pending bills, do you know that the Government of the United States owes $900,000,000 for insurance that has been issued for our boys who crossed over while in Uncle Sam's military service, and the income, amounting to $200,000,000, cuts it to $700,000,000? Do you know that we have got to pass a pension bill before snow flies that will give the one-legged and one-armed boys who served adequate pensions? God knows how much, and we will all vote for such legislation. Two hundred and twenty million dollars a year in pensions for wars which have passed, and then this $900,000,000 to be paid in 20 annual installments to the people who are entitled to receive it under the terms of these insurance policies that have already been adjusted; and with compensation allowed under other sections of the war-risk insurance act it is estimated by the Treasury officials that our annual appropriations to meet these obligations must be nearly $150,000,000 for the next 20 years. How much will be added by deaths of insured men and how much by new pension legislation God only knows. Now, all kinds of things are floating about in the country. I understand there is one proposition to give every soldier $5,000 cash instead of expending $5,000 to buy swamp land and build a $4,000 house on it and amortize it for 40 years. Well, as between the two I would rather give the $5,000 in cash. [Laughter.] I believe it would be a saving to the Treasury, and it would let them do with it what they pleased. Well, that is another proposition modified here and there; propagandas are running. My God! it seems to me if every citizen and every man in the United States—and that would include the women, too—would be as anxious and as industrious in laboring manually, aided by brains—you can not do much labor unless you have got some brains to direct it; the mule and the horse can; the lower order of animal life does not need much brain, but the human family needs brains—I say if the brains that are now being used in the United States by men and women seeking to organize all kinds of societies to do something for the soldiers that the soldiers do not want done, if all this effort could be used in production, making something of value for the human family and the United States and the world, it would solve many of the problems much more rapidly than we are liable to solve them.

You ask if I have a speech about it. No; I have not. But I have thought about it a good deal. If I had my way there would be no necessity for my making such a speech, because we would trim ship and sail on without taking on new burdens that would not return a profit.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would like to know whether the testimony or evidence showed at any place whether the railroads were operating at a profit or loss when the United States took them over?

Mr. CANNON. The railroads were not making a profit, I understand. We did not go into that to any great extent, because we were dealing with the present, and have only the past, prior to the taking over of the railroads here and there, for comparison. My understanding is, I will say to the gentleman, that the railroads were not in a happy condition.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman refers to 1914, one year after the Underwood bill took effect, does he not?

Mr. CANNON. I thought the gentleman referred to 1917.

Mr. FESS. That ought to be an explanation of the railroad situation.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes; that is one explanation of it. After all, that water is over the dam. We think you Democrats are responsible for it, and I think they whisper sometimes and say, "No, no; you Republicans are responsible for it." But that is past. The people who gave the Democratic Party power, partial power by which they could lock the wheels in 1910, and full power in 1912, followed by legislation, and full power for six years and two or three months, have produced a condition that they claim they are not responsible for, and that we may claim, when we get into campaigns that you are responsible for, but which the country does not care three whoops about our quarreling now, because the country wants to know what legislation we write upon the statute books that will give all the people an opportunity to run and glorify, every tub standing on its own bottom. [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I supported this measure at the last session and stated at the time that I felt it was necessary in order that the railroads could pay their indebtedness, that we were under contract to pay to these railroads a certain amount of money, and that the Government should keep its contract. I shall vote for this measure for the same reason. I do wish, however, to call the attention of this committee to some of the items that are causing embarrassment in the Railroad Administration now and will continue to cause embarrassment to it as long as the present administration of railroad affairs continues.

Pretty soon after the railroads were taken over by the Director General of the Railroads, by some process never as yet entirely explained an order was made requiring all the railroads taken over by the Government to take a certain number of cars—freight cars, box cars, flat cars, coal cars, of whatever description—and locomotives. These cars were manufactured at very great expense, some at the institutions already established to manufacture cars; some in institutions that were created for the purpose of manufacturing them. When they were completed, a portion of them—many of them not as yet completed—an allocation was made among the different railroads throughout the country, without regard to whether they needed these cars or not, without regard to whether they could handle these cars on their transportation systems or not. As a result, about one-half of the railroads to which these allocations were made absolutely refused to take these cars, and they still refuse to take them. What the result of this is going to be no one can foretell.

Now, if the railroads do not need them and it would materially embarrass them to take these cars, it would be an absolute wrong to force the cars upon them. That is one situation. If the Government has no way of disposing of these cars according to their allocation, the result will be that they are going to have them on their hands, those that have been manufactured and those to be manufactured under contracts that are binding; and they will have to be sold, as all Government property is sold, at a greatly reduced price, which will cause a still greater deficit, if you please, to the United States and this Railroad Administration.

I know it has been suggested here by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], if I understood him right, that this allocation of cars was made by virtue of the budgets submitted by the different railroads in the early part of 1918. That is denied by the railroads that are refusing to take these cars. And in order that you may know the attitude of some of the railroads on this proposition I desire to call attention to what the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co. has to say on this subject:

During the year the United States Railroad Administration notified this company that there had been allocated to it 3,300 new cars, consisting of 1,000 box cars, 1,300 coal cars, 500 low-side gondolas, and 500 drop-bottom gondolas, costing approximately $9,647,600, for which this company was expected to pay. Your board promptly protested against any such action, and, after argument, the administration canceled its allocation of 1,000 box cars, but insisted that the company take the 2,300 coal and gondola cars. A further protest was thereupon made and the administration notified that the company would not accept the equipment.

This company's freight equipment consists of 42,988 cars, 98 per cent of which are steel or steel underframe, and in excellent condition. It has a larger equipment for its gross business and per mile of road, with one exception (as to per mile of road), than any railroad in the eastern territory. During the year 1917, when it did the largest business in its history, both as to revenue and tonnage, its freight-car hire showed a substantial credit balance; in other words, there was no shortage of cars at the mines located on its line and all local requirements were filled with fewer cars than it actually owned. No additional equipment was asked for in the 1918 budget made up by the administration officials, as none was required.

Paragraph (f) of section 8 of its contract provides that the Director General shall not acquire any equipment at the expense or on the credit of the company in excess of what, in his judgment, is necessary to provide for the traffic requirements of the road. Your board claims that this judgment must be based on facts and not on theories, and the facts clearly show that the company is fully equipped and has a large excess over the amount necessary to handle its traffic.

In this the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co. is corroborated by Mr. Sherley, now of the Railroad Administration, whose testimony before the Appropriations Committee discloses that the budget submitted by the railroads in 1918 did not show or make any estimates for equipment needs.

The amount of the allocation to this road alone amounted to very nearly $9,500,000. To many of these roads that absolutely refused to take these cars, as shown by the report of the director himself, it amounted to as high as $20,000,000. So you can see this item alone has created a very great embarrassment to the administration, also to the United States Government, and will continue so to do. And you may depend upon it that this will be an addditional deficit in the reports of this administration that are yet to come. There is another thing that I think the people ought to know.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. There is another item to which I wish to call your attention, and I think the people of the country should be apprised of it. Under the guise of equipment and betterment not only have these new cars been bought and attempted to be forced upon these different railroads, but the Federal Railroad Administration has undertaken to build new extensions of railroads where they were absolutely not needed for the purposes of war, and where they could not possibly have been completed within two or three or four years of time.

Not only were they diverting capital for the purpose of doing this thing but they were also using labor that should have been employed in other places when labor was so badly needed. I have in mind a case where, on a railroad that has been operating for more than 75 years, they undertook within three months before the armistice was signed the building of a cut-off 8 miles long, and the only purpose it could possibly serve was to shorten the line between the point of its start and the point of its finish about one-half a mile by eliminating a curve or two, which could not possibly have saved more than one minute of time, and possibly reduce the danger incident to a curve, as all curves are conducive to danger.

Now, that thing, as I say, was commenced a few months before the armistice was signed. It could not be completed within two years. Yet a lot of things of that kind involved an expenditure of hundreds and hundreds of thousands of dollars. Therefore I say that millions of dollars that now go to make up this deficit, which will be a constant and growing and increasing deficit for 20 years, are traceable to inefficient and unbusinesslike action alone. We will not know what this deficit will be for years to come. When present Members of Congress are no longer here, there will still be coming up, by reason of this railroad operation, damage claims of various characters that will add to the deficit. So I say that in considering whether or not this Railroad Administration has been efficiently managed, some of these items that are now shown to exist by the report itself speak volumes in language a great deal stronger than I could speak, showing the absolute inefficiency of the Railroad Administration.

The assertion, if you please, that these railroads have been inefficiently managed is supported by the further fact that there are some railroads in this country that were not taken over by the United States which have been efficiently managed.

Many of these the owners sought to have taken over, but were refused, and yet, notwithstanding the fact that they had to pay the same increase of wages and had to pay the same increased cost of materials for their upkeep, they were operated at a profit. That is the most conclusive evidence, if you please, that there is and was inefficiency in the management of these railroads that were taken over.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman state the names of those railroads?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I can state the name of one of them. I can not give its technical corporate name, but the president is Mr. J. N. TINCHER, of Kansas, a Member of this House.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. How large a road is that?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It is not a very large one. It is about 10 miles long. If they could operate that railroad 10 miles long at a profit under the circumstances—and the profitable operation of a road that long is ordinarily deemed an impossible thing—what ought you to do when you have a workable, practicable system of great railroads running through rich territories such as those which the roads controlled by the Railroad Administration ran through?

It might have been necessary as a war measure to take the railroads over for the time being; be that as it may; but I think that the operation of the railroads by the Government has furnished to the public and to the world the best possible argument as to the absolute fallacy of ever attempting to make Government control and Government ownership one of the fixed features of this Government of ours. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the items which go to make up this appropriation have been so very thoroughly discussed that there is little further that I can say. But after a very careful reading of the hearings, there are some few observations which I wish to submit to the committee. These hearings cover about 358 pages, and I want to take occasion to compliment the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, for the very able and thorough manner in which he conducted the examination and developed the facts. [Applause.]

Now, gentlemen, in the last analysis, what are the facts with reference to the Railroad Administration and the necessity of this appropriation? In the beginning of 1918—or, to be exact, on December 28, 1917—the United States Government took over the operation of the railroads of the country. At that time there was no dissenting voice; no one criticized the action of the Government in taking them over. On the contrary, Congress, on both sides of this Chamber and in the other branch, gave the President the authority to take the railroads over during the war, because everyone recognized that it was necessary to take them over for war purposes. It was clearly a war necessity, not only for the prompt handling of transportation, transporting our soldiers quickly to the various camps and to the various ports, but in the quick transportation of supplies and the munitions of war that were necessary to carry on the war. We all know, also, that at that time many of the railroads, owing to abnormal conditions, were facing bankruptcy. Had they not been taken over, owing to these conditions, including the loss of efficiency, due to many of their efficient employees entering the military service and many others leaving the railroad service for the purpose of accepting more lucrative employment in other industries, and the extraordinary increase in the cost of materials and supplies, many of these railroads would have gone into the hands of receivers, and that would have created a financial crisis which would have been disastrous and possibly fatal to the winning of the war. So, I say, the railroads were taken over at that time, with the approval of Republicans as well as Democrats, and when they were taken over the Government assumed certain obligations with which we are faced to-day, and which it is necessary for the Government to meet.

Now, what are those obligations? In the first place, it has been stated that we are faced with two deficits—one of about $236,000,000, occurring in 1918, and the other of $250,000,000, a deficit which was incurred during the first four months of the present year, making a total of $486,000,000, which must be charged off to the account of profit and loss. This is a clear loss to the Government and must be considered as one of the expenses of the war. In addition to that, the Director General of Railroads states that there is due as an obligation on the part of this Government for additions and betterments, including equipment, the sum of $775,000,000.

And I may say that that statement is made up not only of additions, betterments, and equipments but also of over $40,000,000, as was explained by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], by way of a loan made to the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad, about $20,000,000 to the Boston & Maine, and about $100,000,000 advanced by the Director General to enable the railroads to meet their current liabilities.

In addition to that, the Railroad Administration now has a working capital of about $202,000,000; but that is not a present available asset, for the reason that it is stated that from $140,000,000 to $170,000,000 is now in the hands of conductors and agents over the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

By unanimous consent the time of Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee was extended five minutes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Now, if you add these three figures together you get the sum of $1,422,596,252 in exact figures. Congress has heretofore appropriated the sum of $500,000,000, leaving a balance of $922,596,252, which is needed to fully meet these obligations. And that does not take into consideration the sum of about $14,000,000 which the Director General asks for inland waterways.

Now, what is the situation? The Director General states that the United States Government is obligated to industries over this country in the sum of $775,000,000; and in a hearing in the United States Senate in the last session on a similar bill he stated that $700,000,000 of that amount should be paid by the last of May.

This bill carries $750,000,000, or over $100,000,000 less than the amount which the Director General states is absolutely necessary to take care of the deficit and meet these obligations of the Government and maintain the present working capital, the greater part of which can not be applied to these obligations because it is not available, as I have explained.

Now, there is no use in juggling with figures. This is the situation which confronts us. We should meet it fairly and squarely. There is no reason or justice in withholding these sums for materials delivered and materials now under way, and for which the United States Government promised and obligated itself to pay when the orders were given. They have got to be paid. Why not accept the situation frankly as it is and discharge the obligation of the United States, and then take proper steps for reimbursement by the railroads.

Gentlemen have criticized the Railroad Administration for undertaking to give orders for so many box cars and so many locomotives, but these gentlemen are now talking in peace times. When these orders were given, these gentlemen would not have offered any criticism of the Railroad Administration for giving these orders, because they were necessary in order to take care of the business during the war. If it had been known that the war was coming to an end at so early a date, these orders would not have been given. One can with as good grace complain because the end of the war found the Government with an immense amount of ammunition on hand.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. JUUL. The gentleman is making a very interesting statement. I would like to have him tell us what part of the original $500,000,000 and of the $750,000,000 now sought to be appropriated does the gentleman think will ever be recovered into the United States Treasury?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. All of it, it is expected, will be recovered, except the deficiency of $486,000,000, which, as I have stated, is a clear loss. This money is advanced to the railroads with the expectation and understanding that it will be returned, and the Director General states that it is in his opinion well secured.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I want to ask the gentleman whether that amount that we have advanced to the railroads is in addition to the rentals which have accrued? Have we paid for the rental of the railroads in addition to advancing these amounts?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; this sum to which I have referred is to take care of what is due for additions, betterments, and equipments.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Perhaps I did not make myself clear. We have made certain betterments and additions. Have we credited the rentals on that account or have we paid the rentals and made those advances in addition?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. In some cases, as I recall the hearings, it has been done. In other cases it has not been done. The amount heretofore appropriated was placed in a pool from which all expenses were paid.

Mr. JUUL. Does the United States Government pay the railroads in cash for the transportation of its soldiers and materials?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It does. In order to tide over the situation caused by the failure to appropriate the $750,000,000, on account of the filibuster at the other end of the Capitol in March, they collected from the War Department $100,000,000 due for the transportation of soldiers and supplies, and something like $10,000,000 from the Navy Department. Now, I have only a few minutes. Why should we appropriate this sum of $775,000,000 now, rather than wait a few months, as suggested by the gentleman from Iowa, before paying this just obligation? The Director General answers that question and answers it specifically, and I am going to read to this committee exactly what the Director General says upon that subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

By unanimous consent the time of Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee was extended five minutes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mind you, this answer was given in response to the question which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] read a moment ago, and the reasons given by the Director General are in addition to the reasons that we ought not to submit the industries of this country to the injustice of delay in payment for materials and supplies furnished, and for which the United States stands primarily responsible. They will thus be prevented from meeting their obligations. And if there is any such loss or delay I wish the business interests to know just who is responsible therefor.

Now, what does the Director General say?

> But, going back to your specific question, I do not think there is any doubt, in the light of things as they have developed, that if we had secured the $750,000,000 appropriation on the 4th of March and Congress had not met and could not have dealt with that matter any further until December, we would have been very greatly embarrassed and hampered in clearing up this situation. The way it would have shown itself principally would have been in the holding back of the efforts which we want to make to get the railroad companies to refinance what they owe the Government. That whole thing has been in a state of suspense, first, from one cause and then from another. During the year 1918 it was the war and the Government's financing, in the early part of this year it was the forthcoming Government loan and also our extreme shortage of cash, and then it was the failure of the appropriation.
> If we get an appropriation which enables us to clean up in full and enables the corporations to pay off all the temporary loans they have had to make to pay their interest and dividends, we then will be in a position to begin to put the pressure on the corporations to refinance and reimburse the Government. But if we had had a $750,000,000 appropriation on March 4 and then there had been the developments, as they have taken place, and no further appropriation had been forthcoming until December or January, we would have been in a position where we would not have any leverage to exercise, because we would not have been able to pay, and under the contract our principal leverage is to say to the corporations that we will not pay them what we owe them until they take reasonable steps to reimburse the Government. If we are in the position, through shortage of cash, that we can not pay them anyhow, that does not amount to very much leverage; and it gives them an excellent excuse for not doing anything effective in the way of reimbursing the Government. I have, perhaps, strayed far from your question, Mr. Chairman, but I am so impressed with the value to the Government of making available a special fund to clean this up, and then putting us on solid ground, and then to make the corporations come across and reimburse the Government. Undoubtedly we would have suffered from an inability to do that on the hypothesis of your question of getting $750,000,000 on the 4th of March and there being no relief before next December.

Yet, gentlemen, we are in the act here of failing to appropriate by over $100,000,000 the amount which the Director General says is necessary in order to enable him to force these corporations to come across and reimburse this Government. Gentlemen speak of their earnest desire for an early return of the railroads. I want to see the time come quickly when our Treasury may be relieved of the responsibility of guaranteeing their debts incurred for additions and betterments. I want the railroads to be made to finance themselves, and therefore I believe this sum, which must be appropriated sooner or later, should be appropriated now, so as to enable the Director General to compel the railroads to take over their own financing. By your failure to do so, you are delaying the time when this will be done and are thus creating a still further charge upon the Treasury. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] says that very shortly, within two or three months, it will be necessary for him to come back and ask for another appropriation to take care of this situation. I submit, gentlemen, that in view of the fact, admitted on the floor of this House, that within the next two or three months it will be necessary to come here and ask for an additional appropriation, we ought not to put ourselves in the attitude of trying to fool either ourselves or the public.

I am as heartily in favor of economy as anyone. I have been so throughout my service in Congress. I will go as far as anyone in the effort to cut down expenses, but we must not hamper this service or put our Government in the attitude of failing to take care of its obligations. If this money must be appropriated, as the gentleman from Iowa admits, we should not, merely because we do not wish to be put in the attitude of appropriating a larger sum than was carried in the bill passed in March by a Democratic House, evade our plain duty. If we delay for two or three months, as the gentleman suggests, then we postpone the time when the railroads will be made to take care of themselves, which is poor business and poor economy. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, this is a very interesting topic, one in which I think the whole people of the United States is very much interested and is looking forward to action by the Congress to relieve them from the onerous burden placed upon them during the war to the extent that it is possible to find relief.

What is the situation with respect to the railroad proposition? A year ago we appropriated $500,000,000. If the railroad companies were compelled to pay interest on that for the two years they will have it, it would amount to $40,000,000. No interest has been charged, but it is to be counted in the loss, for the Government of the United States pays interest on the money it borrows and which it appropriates.

Now, we are appropriating $750,000,000 and it is altogether likely that the railroad companies will have this money for at least a year, and the interest charged on that at 4 per cent will amount to $30,000,000. Then we have lost $236,000,000 in 1918 and $250,000,000 for the first four months of 1919. And if they keep the railroads for two years from the time the Government took control they will have collected $2,200,000,000 in excess freight and passenger rates. That would make a grand total of $4,006,000,000.

The Director General says we are going to get $775,000,000 back, but we are not going to get back anything they collected as excess passenger and freight money. What part of that is included in the $775,000,000 I do not know, neither does the Director General. But if we assume that he knows what he is talking about, and we do get $775,000,000 back, we will still have lost as the result of Government ownership $3,231,000,000 to be charged to the extravagance and waste of Government operation.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. And Director General Hines admits himself that there is a loss of $486,000,000 that we will never get back.

Mr. MADDEN. That is the total loss that he is ready to admit. I am going to add the difference between $3,231,000,000 and $486,000,000, the amount I think the people ought to know about.

You say the railroads were bankrupt in 1914 and that the Government had to take them over when it did. It may be that they were bankrupt—I do not know—but what made them bankrupt? There was never a period of greater prosperity than in 1913 when the Democrats took control of this Government. Everybody will admit that, even the Democrats.

But you passed the Underwood bill immediately after you came into power, and you began an era of reckless, wasteful extravagance in the expenditure of public money the like of which was never seen before. You opened the ports of America by the Underwood bill and admitted goods made in all parts of the world. They took possession of the markets of America.

The mills were idle and men were thrown out of employment. You reduced the value of the farmers' products everywhere. You put Canada in competition with the American farmer in all the cereal products and compelled him to compete in free markets while Canada prevented America from reciprocal privileges.

That is not all; to meet the extravagant waste that you had entered upon you levied a tax of $120,000,000 against the American people and called it a war tax. It was in a time of peace, but you called it a war tax. We were not in war. The President of the United States said we were at peace with all the world, and even in 1915 and away up to the fall of 1916 the President said we were at peace, and he went before the American people for reelection on the ground that he had kept us out of war. And in the face of all this you levied a tax in 1914 of $120,000,000, calling it a war tax, to meet your wasteful expenditure. Why, you made it impossible for the mills to run, for men to work, for the farmer to sell his goods anywhere at a decent price. There was not anything for the railroads to carry, because you had made it impossible for business to move.

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman said a moment ago, and I expect him to discuss it, that the railroads were most prosperous in 1913, 1914, and 1915.

Mr. MADDEN. I said the country was the most prosperous in 1913 that it had ever been at any time in history.

Mr. RAYBURN. And statistics also show that in those two years of Democratic administration the railroads were more prosperous than they had ever been in any year before.

Mr. MADDEN. You could not help their being prosperous. [Applause on the Republican side.] The Democrats had nothing to do with that. The war did it.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. The war erected a tariff wall around this country.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course. You could not bring goods in.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am very glad to hear the gentleman admit that there was one period of prosperity for which the Republican Party was not responsible. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. Whether it was responsible or not, the Democratic Party certainly was not responsible. The only thing they have ever been responsible for was the bankruptcy of the country when they were in power. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. No. Then, later on the Railroad Administration purchased all kinds of equipment at war prices, without consultation with the railroad companies themselves, and they are charging that up to the railroad expenses. It may be that they needed this equipment, but the Railroad Administration bought the kind of equipment that the railroad companies protested against buying, and now they propose to cancel a part of their losses, their obligations against the railroads by charging them for the equipment they did not want and never wanted at prices that only Mr. McAdoo and John Skelton Williams, who was the financial manager of the Railroad Administration, could justify. Nobody else in the world could justify the prices. I say that the reckless waste of money by the Railroad Administration under Mr. McAdoo and Mr. Williams no man living can justify, and loss on this account was inevitable. But why should the people of the United States continue to pay? We must maintain the railroads while we control them and operate them——

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. No; I have not the time. The sooner we can unload them back into the hands of men who are interested in their economic management the better it will be for the railroads and the better for the American people. [Applause on Republican side.] We are not merely making a loss of $486,000,000—remember that; we are making a loss of anywhere from $3,250,000,000 to $4,000,000,000 in two years of Government control, and that is more by $1,000,000,000 than it ever cost to run the Government for the same period of time when it was being managed by the Republican Party. Get the credit you want out of the operation of the railroads, if you can get credit for the kind of management you have given the railroads, but assume the responsibility for the extravagance and waste and inefficiency, as you must, when all the facts are presented to the American people. [Applause on Republican side.]

Mr. MAGEE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. MAGEE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent at this time to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAGEE. Mr. Chairman, the questions involved have been so ably and completely covered by the distinguished chairman of the committee that I desire to take the time of the House only to make a single observation. I am not in favor of making an appropriation at this time in excess of the $750,000,000 provided in this bill. I am well aware that this amount does not satisfy the Democratic administration. We get deficiencies here all the time, but I feel that if we were so disposed we could not begin to provide the amount of money that they would spend if they could get hold of it.

So far as the obligations of the Government are concerned, everyone concedes that they must be fully met. There is no question about that; but the point is that at this time no one, not even the Director General nor anybody else in the administration, can tell what will finally be the aggregate of the obligations of the Government in respect to taking over the railroads.

There are some facts that I want to get clearly in your mind, because they can not be disputed. They are contained in the record of the hearings, and I would advise every Member in this House to get a copy thereof and read the same diligently. It will interest you and pay you. It will be a revelation to you, in my judgment, of inefficiency and extravagant administration of public affairs.

It is conceded that the Railroad Administration had a deficit in 1918 of $236,000,000. It is conceded that in 1918 they increased wages $852,000,000. In other words, they increased the wages $616,000,000 more than the deficit in 1918. These increases in wages are entirely independent of the increases in wages which resulted by reason of the passage of what is known as the Adamson bill in September, 1916. What did they do to meet the situation which they created? If they had not increased wages, there would have been a surplus last year in operation of over $600,000,000. If they had increased wages only 26 per cent instead of 52 per cent, there still would have been a surplus of about $190,000,000.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAGEE. I have not very much time. If I can get additional time, I will be very glad to yield to the gentleman. I am merely stating facts in the record which the Director General gave. I yield for a question.

Mr. BLACK. I just wanted to ask the gentleman if it is his contention that the wage increase ought not to have been made?

Mr. MAGEE. I am not formulating the policy of the administration. I am giving my views, and I shall say something upon that proposition later. How did they meet the situation?

They raised freight and passenger rates substantially 25 per cent. They went into effect in June, 1918. They were in effect last year substantially 6 months and 20 days. The Director General said that from the increase in freight and passenger rates the Government obtained $560,000,000. That increase in rates on the basis of a whole year would produce about $1,000,000,000. Now, a 7 per cent additional increase in rates, based upon the increase of a billion dollars a year, as stated by the Director General, would take care of a deficit of more than $250,000,000, an amount in excess of the deficit of 1918.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MAGEE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for an additional 10 minutes. I may not take all of that time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. BARKLEY. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman make that observation he started out to make in the beginning of his five minutes a while ago?

Mr. MAGEE. If the gentleman will be patient I think that he will get the observation.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MAGEE. I am sure he will. For the first four months of this year they say they have a deficit of $250,000,000. Now, what do they propose to do to meet the existing situation? Nothing—absolutely drifting. That is the proposition of the Railroad Administration; that is the proposition of the Democratic Party here, simply to drift.

Mr. CONNALLY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAGEE. Now, unless some provision is made—I will yield for a question.

Mr. CONNALLY. While we are drifting, will the gentleman please drift back and answer the question of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. MAGEE. The gentleman will get that question answered if he will have a little patience. I did not suppose that I was going to get so deeply under your epidermis that I would no more than get my remarks started when I would have some interruption from that side of the aisle.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield for a fair question? I assume the gentleman's solution of the whole matter would be an increase of freight rates. The gentleman knows, and he has stated so in reference to 1918, or does not the gentleman know that an increase of freight rates would necessarily increase the cost of living, and I want to ask the gentleman if he favors an increase of the cost of living at this particular time?

Mr. MAGEE. I am going to come to that proposition. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KREIDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAGEE. I understand just exactly what the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee says. They do not want to meet their obligations and responsibilities of administration, because they have a camouflaged excuse. If there is anything in the world that can increase the cost of living to any greater extent than the policy of the Democratic Party in the last three or four years, I would like to have you tell me what it is, and I will have it framed and put on exhibition. [Applause on the Republican side.] If you read these hearings from beginning to end, you will not find a single suggestion of economy. You can not point out one; you have not a suggestion to make; you are absolutely drifting; and that is the only policy you have.

I was surprised to learn in reading these hearings that the salary of the Director General is fixed at $25,000 a year, while they have five regional directors with a salary fixed at $50,000 each per year and two more regional directors with a salary of $40,000 each. That is an illustration of Democratic economy.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MAGEE. Let me state this observation, and then I will answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Then go ahead.

Mr. MAGEE. We have a situation here that we should meet like men. As suggested by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], you should meet your full responsibility. You have the choice of doing one of three things—reduce wages, increase rates about 10 per cent, or make provision for a large governmental loss. This suggestion should also include efficiency in operation and economy in operation, which have been so sadly lacking to date.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. What is the gentleman's——

Mr. MAGEE. Everybody knows——

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman state his choice?

Mr. MAGEE (continuing). There is a pending deficit for 1919 of $250,000,000, and nobody can tell what it will amount to by the end of the year, but if I were to make an estimate I would say not less than $500,000,000.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAGEE. Now, I would like to say to the gentleman from South Carolina, and I wish he would listen to this——

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I will.

Mr. MAGEE. The administration had the courage to increase wages in 1918 to such an extent as to turn a handsome surplus into a large deficit. Why has not the Railroad Administration the moral courage at this time to practice efficiency and economy and to increase rates sufficiently to meet the pending and continuing operating deficit?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Has the gentleman the moral courage to state his own views, whether rates ought to have been increased then and wages reduced?

Mr. MAGEE. If the gentleman can not understand what my views are from what I have said, it would be impossible for me to present any proposition to the gentleman which he could understand. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I would like to ask the gentleman—the gentleman has stood there and criticized the Director General first for raising wages—would he have refused to raise them? The gentleman has criticized him for not increasing the rates. Would the gentleman raise the rates? Does the gentleman favor raising the rates?

Mr. MAGEE. In answer to the gentleman's question, I desire to say this: The Director General—not the present one but his predecessor—or I will say the Railroad Administration——

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. MAGEE (continuing). Having raised wages to the extent to which they did raise them, they are bound by reason of that act—that, apparently, being their fixed policy—to meet their responsibilities to the Government by devising ways and means to offset the increased costs of operation.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Then, you were opposed to raising the wages, were you?

Mr. MAGEE. You can draw your own conclusion.

Mr. KRIEDER. Will the gentleman from New York yield to me a minute?

Mr. MAGEE. Yes.

Mr. KREIDER. Is it not a fact that the Railroad Administration advanced the wages about $800,000,000 and collected from the people of the country $1,500,000,000 with which to pay them, but failed to do it, having squandered the balance in inefficient management, and that we are called upon to tax the people to pay the deficit which was caused by inefficient management? That is the truth of the matter. You can talk about increasing the wages all you please. You collected from the people twice as much as was needed to pay the increase in wages, and now you want an appropriation in order to make good. [Applause.]

Mr. MAGEE. Mr. Chairman, I want to make this point: That we have reached the time—and I also appeal to my colleagues across the aisle—when, in view of the facts and circumstances, in view of a deficiency of $250,000,000 in the first four months of the year, in view of the probability that the Government will continue to operate the roads for the rest of the year—and possibly, if there should not be an agreement, or such a bill passed as the President may approve, perhaps longer—we should meet the situation squarely like men and not camouflage it by saying if the Railroad Administration increases the rates 5 or 7 per cent, such action will increase the cost of living; not camouflage the situation by saying that the railroad receipts during the latter part of the year will be greater and sufficient to meet the deficit, because those months will cover the grain-moving period. I say, that such an argument as that is simply "passing the buck" to the taxpayers of the country. That is all it means. I ask you now in all fairness and in all seriousness, to meet this situation and do your duty to the Government by taking such action as will save the Government from a loss of $500,000,000 in the operation of the railroads for the year 1919. [Applause.]

Mr. BARKLEY. You are in power, why do you not do it?

Mr. MAGEE. The gentleman must know that the Railroad Administration is under Democratic control. I am satisfied that by efficiency and economy in operation, and by a very moderate increase in rates the pending and continuing operating deficit can be fully met. We should adopt this policy of affirmative action instead of the existing policy of drifting and save to the Government hundreds of millions of dollars. [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last eight words.

If I understood correctly the attitude of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], the gist of his remarks was that, while he believed this appropriation was some $250,000,000 smaller than it ought to be, he would not offer an amendment to increase it to the sum which he thinks and attempted to demonstrate should be provided.

It is a rather pathetic and pitiful situation, gentlemen of the committee, that the Chief Executive, in whom, after all, the control of these roads was placed by the Congress, with that functionary abroad seeking to defend the 14 points and various other important matters now engaging the attention of civilization, that he should not find, particularly upon the Appropriations Committee, a champion with sufficient courage to offer an amendment to a bill to help ward off a pending deficit, but who will come in and argue with all the fervor and strength that he possesses—and the genial gentleman has a full supply of those qualities—will come in and argue and protest, and yet announce, after all, that he will not attempt to offer an amendment to provide the sum which he thinks is necessary.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I prefer not to yield, because I do not intend to ask for additional time.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I would like to know if the gentleman would vote for it?

Mr. WALSH. No; I would not vote for it, because I agree with the chairman of the committee it is not necessary at this time. I say if it is necessary in the operation of any Government facility to ward off a financial panic or prevent business disaster throughout this country, I am ready to vote to decrease the wages of any Government-operating facility at any time.

Why, the railroad employees have based their demands not upon what their service is worth but upon what they can get the administration and its officials to yield to their demands. The idea of paying flagmen throughout this country $31 a week to wave a flag at the railroad crossings when trains are passing!

Who ever heard of a flagman—and they are mostly men of advanced years—who could perform service worth wages at that rate? The basis of the wages fixed in many instances has not been the worth of the service performed. It has been simply what the employees have demanded, and their demands have been met in most instances without any modification.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Here they think it is something to be afraid of to say the Government should not hesitate to reduce wages. I submit, gentlemen, that our allegiance is to the Government first, and if it is necessary in order to preserve our Government in all its operations, and to give efficient service, and to save the country from financial panic or disaster, and, furthermore, to preserve the Treasury of the United States, we ought not to hesitate to say that we will advocate a reduction and a revision in the wage scale of publicly operated and managed utilities.

Mr. BLANTON. Now, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman from Texas, because my irrepressible friend would ask the question of somebody else, I know.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the wage to be paid to the flagman any more out of proportion than the $180 per month we now pay to the conductor for six days a week service, when he has an auditor to go along with him and take up the tickets?

Mr. WALSH. Well, I submit, gentlemen, that many of these wages and wage scales that have been adopted by the Railroad Administration are excessive, and I doubt not but what if we had another Lane commission, perhaps a commission that was free from any other connection with Government operations, we might see in their recommendations some plan whereby some of these rates and wages would be reduced. I simply repeat that our duty first is to the people of the country. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last 10 words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, this performance is so strictly in harmony with other performances that I have been witnessing now since the beginning of this session and which I witnessed back before the last session wound up that it seems utterly imposible that I am convinced that no bill of any kind or of whatever nature may be introduced into this House without gentlemen going over their same old song of criticism of the President being in Versailles, their same old song in regard to the cost of things increasing since the Democrats came into power, in regard to the increased importations, and the lowering of prices of everything produced, especially by the farmers in this country.

When I listened to the humorous "bunk" of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] a little while ago I thought I was hearing a Fourth of July address at some wild forks of the road full of errors and fallacies, to which no one ought ever be condemned to listen. [Laughter.] The gentleman started out with the statement that up to 1914 this country was going to the bow wows and that farmers' products were being reduced in price because of importations under the Underwood bill. The gentleman knows that after the Democrats came into power—from the very day they came into power—farmers were obtaining the highest prices they had ever realized up to that time for their products, and the gentleman knows that to-day the farmers are receiving more for their products than they ever did before in the history of the world.

Then another gentleman [Mr. WALSH] says we ought to reduce the wages of the workingmen while still higher enhancing the prices of the things he must buy and consume. He may be bold, but I do not believe he will go before his constituents on that platform. The gentleman [Mr. WALSH] knows that to-day the laborer is paying more for his bread, paying more for his meat, paying more for his house rent, paying more for everything he buys than ever before, and yet he says he would have the nerve—yes, arbitrarily by the Government—to reduce the workingman's wages. He would not dare have his party go before the country on that kind of a platform. If he did it himself, he would be in a party by himself.

The truth is, I have listened with a great deal of irritation to continued Republican attack and misrepresentation, and with a great deal of patience to Democrats, though not with entire approval of the fact that the Democrats on this side of the aisle have almost always confined their remarks to measures directly before the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] They have failed to reply to the assertions and denunciations that are constant and continuous on the other side of the House.

My friend the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] said that the Railroad Administration had cost this Government $4,000,000,000. I think he gave about $1,000,000,000 as the amount the deficit would be and $3,000,000,000 for increased freight. The gentleman knows that the dollar to-day in the prices of all commodities throughout all the world does not buy more than what 50 cents used to buy a few years ago. Freight rates have been increased 25 per cent. That is all the gentleman can truthfully state. Is that a real increase in the cost of carriage in comparison with the value of the commodities carried or when we consider the real fall in value of the dollar? Not at all. The man who pays 25 per cent more freight is not paying more in proportion to the wages paid, in proportion to the cost of material. He really is not paying as much.

Not only so, Mr. Chairman, but the merits of every measure that comes before the Congress are lost sight of in the universal attempt to make political capital by gentlemen on that side. One gentleman arose in a perfect furore a moment ago and made a tirade just generally of charges, that all the increased railroad rates were from inefficiency, without stating one fact to bear him out. It does seem to me that the time has come when Members of Congress, who are sent here to serve the best interests of the people, ought to direct their attention somewhat to the measures coming before the House. There is one body of men in this Capitol that ought to be termed "The Unlimited Ten-hour, Twelve-hour, Fourteen-hour Talkfest Union." It is one union that does not want any eight-hour day.

And all the time and every time they talk it is for the purpose of making an attack on the administration. The President was attacked, first, because he went to Europe, and, second, because when he went there he did not forestall all the action of the council by telling what he was going to do. And since he has been there he has been attacked every morning because he did not send word before breakfast what he did the day before. These gentlemen, if they had been present when God Almighty was trying to evolve order out of chaos, would have called upon Him every morning to state what He did the day before. [Laughter and applause.] They never would have waited six days until He had completed creation. They would have demanded at least a daily report.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I will yield to the gentleman for a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. KNUTSON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas be given one minute more. I want to ask him a question.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I will ask that it be made five minutes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. Pending that, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the bill and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that all debate on the bill and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas has unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. KNUTSON. I would like to ask my friend from Texas if he considers this proposed constitution of the league of nations an "open covenant openly arrived at"?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I will answer the gentleman in this way, that no power under the sun could tell what that council necessarily must encounter in readjusting the map of the world, and gentlemen like the one who asked me that question know full well that the council can not tell to-day what their conclusions to-morrow will be. [Laughter on the Republican side.] And gentlemen on the Republican side know full well that if they were debating a question on this floor, unless they were content to tie their hands and unless they were determined on a policy regardless of right and justice, they could not tell what the action of the Republican Party would be. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] And furthermore, the gentleman knows to-day that the members of his party do not now know whether they intend to make it a party policy to oppose the league of nations. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] And furthermore, they know that while they desire to attack anything that Woodrow Wilson does, they dare not put their condemnation upon the league of nations now. [Applause on Democratic side.]

Now, the other day—that is, in the closing hours of the Sixty-fifth Congress—your leader on the floor here [Mr. MANN], fearing that the party would take a political position of that kind, made a five-minute speech on the league of nations, which ought to have been a warning to you. He said we were asking and seeking nothing from that council of nations except a league of peace. He said that if our representatives secured that we would be justified in our war; but if we did not get that our whole fight would have been in vain. Yet over there your leaders are attacking the league of nations in the morning before breakfast and attacking it at noon and attacking it in the afternoon before supper; yes, attacking it because it did not mention the Monroe doctrine and attacking it because it does mention the Monroe doctrine; attacking it because it was not definite and then attacking it because it was definite; attacking because it parted with the sovereignty of the nations and then attacking it because it accomplishes nothing. There is nothing in the category of crimes that will not be laid at the door of the league of nations, and yet the Republicans as a party do not dare come out and denounce it. And your conscience keeper has advised you to take no stand upon it until you shall caucus or confer about it.

Mr. REAVIS. I agree with the gentleman that our remarks should be confined to the bill under discussion, and I want to ask him this question regarding that measure——

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Which measure? [Laughter.] If the gentleman wants to ask me a question with regard to the league of nations, fire away.

Mr. REAVIS. No; with regard——

Mr. HARDY of Texas. If the gentleman wants to ask me a question with regard to this bill, I hope he will be very careful. I may not be able to answer it. Go ahead.

Mr. REAVIS. I only presume to ask the gentleman a question regarding the bill now before the House, because he stated that he thought all remarks should be confined to the bill under discussion.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Oh, no; I stated that I was going outside of the RECORD to follow some of the gentlemen on that side who never touched the bill.

Mr. REAVIS. Without regard to that, that is not particularly pertinent to the question——

Mr. HARDY of Texas. When the gentleman asks his question, if I can not answer it I will simply say so.

Mr. REAVIS. As a matter of good business judgment, if the Railroad Administration, by the increase of wages, a voluntary action on their part, increased the expenses of the business to such an extent that it would show a deficit, should they not likewise increase the rates so as adequately to take care of the obligations which they voluntarily incurred?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I think I will take the time to answer that question, although it is a question which the last speaker on your side persistently and continuously refused to answer. I think the Director General gave perhaps the most consistent, intelligent, and appropriate answer to the gentleman's question. His answer has been read here by Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. He stated that we were going through a period, as it were, of reconstruction, and that in his belief the volume of business would increase enough to avoid a deficit. He said that June, July, and August were lean months, and if they raised rates to make them profitable now they would be too high when the heavy freight months came, and before raising rates and possibly fixing an excessive rate on the people he wanted to have it demonstrated as to whether or not his judgment was right. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] will correct me if I have not correctly stated this. If I remember aright, that was substantially the statement of Director General Hines. The gentleman from South Carolina in his clear and strong statement to this House on this bill said that at first he thought the director was mistaken, and thought they ought to raise rates now, but that upon full consideration he was convinced that the Director General's policy of continuing the existing rates for the present was wise. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I will not ask for further time.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, every time a Member on the Republican side of the House makes mention of the fact of the absence of the President in Europe there is resentment expressed by some Member on the Democratic side. This is some five or six months after the President left these shores, and not often has the fact of his absence been mentioned save in connection with inconvenience in legislation occasioned by his absence. If the Democratic members of this committee will recall, the criticism that was centered against the President going abroad did not originate among Republicans, but it came more largely from the Democratic press than from the Republican press up to the time of his going. That sentiment was largely shared by the Democrats in this Chamber, as expressed in the cloakroom and private conversations. The Republican side took the position that if criticism would prevent his going, it would and should be offered. If it would not prevent his going, there would be no criticism by the Republicans as a party. This policy has been strictly adhered to within this Chamber. I am interested to know why, every time mention is made of the President's absence, in connection with our legislation when we are bending our energies to pass the supply bills before the end of the fiscal year, June 30, 1919, there should be such a feeling of unrest, especially in the light of criticism from the Democratic press prior to the President's going. I think the Democratic Members here either do not know, or else they have forgotten, or else they have no respect for the past, as to their attitude on the President being away from this Capital even though he did not go out of the country. Evidently the Democratic Members do not recall the action of the Forty-first Congress, first session, April 3, 1876. The record of the action of that Democratic Congress will be found on page 2156 of volume 4, part 3, of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Let me read the resolution passed by a Democratic Congress under suspension of the rules that required two-thirds majority, and that did not receive one dissenting vote on the Democratic or Republican side. This is the resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House, if in his opinion it is not incompatible with the public interest, whether, since the 4th day of March, 1869, any executive offices, acts, or duties, and if any what, have been performed at a distance from the seat of government established by law, and for how long a period at any one time, and in what part of the United States; also whether any public necessity existed for such performance, and if so of what character; and how far the performance of such executive offices, acts, or duties at such distance from the seat of government established by law was in compliance with the act of Congress of the 16th day of July, 1790.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What Congress was it that passed that resolution?

Mr. FESS. The Forty-first.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The gentleman does not claim the Forty-first Congress was a Democratic Congress?

Mr. FESS. It was the Congress presided over by Speaker Randall.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Forty-fourth Congress was the first Democratic Congress after the war.

Mr. FESS. Then it was the Forty-fourth. [Laughter.] I am delighted to have this explosion of enthusiasm on behalf of the ex-Speaker, whose statements I always regard as accurate. That Congress was presided over by Samuel J. Randall, whatever the number of the Congress, and the date was April 3, 1876.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

By unanimous consent the time of Mr. FESS was extended five minutes.

Mr. FESS. I accept the correction of ex-Speaker CLARK as to its being the Forty-fourth Congress instead of the Forty-first, and reaffirm that the resolution was passed on that date, April 3, 1876.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I was just simply trying to get the gentleman straight on his facts.

Mr. FESS. I accept the correction as to the number of the Congress, but I do not accept any suggestion that my statement about the resolution is incorrect. President Grant was over at Long Branch because of the condition of his health, and he exercised some executive functions while over there, and that Democratic Congress so resented his absence from the Capitol that this resolution was passed under suspension of the rules.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. No; I can not yield. With our President away from the shores of the country, if any of us on this side refers either to the inconvenience or should question its wisdom, there seems to be immediately a resentment on the Democratic side as if we had no right to do it. In the light of the Democratic position on this question as expressed in the resolution, this attitude, to say the least, is interesting. So much for the lecture we received from the Democratic Member from Texas a moment ago.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman permit me to make a statement of the reason, briefly?

Mr. FESS. I would rather the gentleman would make it in his own time.

Mr. RUCKER. We will give the gentleman from Ohio more time if he wishes it.

Mr. GARRETT. I can tell the gentleman in a single sentence.

Mr. FESS. I think the gentleman had better do it in his own time. Now, as to this measure before us, there is one of three things that must be done. I am not going to repeat them, because they are well understood, but when we mention one of them—that it may be necessary to increase rates, freight and passenger—instantly some one says, "Are you in favor of it?" as if you were afraid to take a position on the railway question. The other, if you do not increase the rates there must be of necessity a reduction of expenses. Instantly some one will say, "Are you in favor of reducing the scale of wages?" as if the man would be afraid to assert his duty on this question if the issue should arise. What we ought to do, what we must do, is to have the courage, not to think that we can blind the shipping public by refusing to say that we may be required to pay higher rates, or to think we can in any deceptive way keep from the laborer the facts by refusing to say that we may be required to reduce his wages, but meet the situation as it faces us, rather than through our acts here attempt to legislate by deception and play the two ends against the middle by refusing to say either to the shipper and the farmer you must assume an increase of burden or to the laborer "you may be required to reduce the wages in some form," and in this way attempt to deceive by proceeding in a way that nobody knows what we intend to do. That is demagogy.

We will either increase the rates or reduce the expenditures, and I am not sure but that we will have to do both, because the business of transportation must be continued and must not suffer bankruptcy. What the public has a right to demand of this Congress is that the railroads shall not be run for profit alone; that the railroads shall not be run for labor alone; that the element to be considered is not the profit to the owner to the exclusion of other elements, nor is it the wages of the laboring men to the exclusion of others, but the public, the largest factor, has a right to demand efficiency in service for which it pays and a rational economy in the railroad system. If it is necessary to increase the passenger and freight rates or to reduce wages, or both, we have got to have the courage to do it. The one thing of which we are all assured, the present situation can not continue. I am willing to vote the necessary money to insure transportation, and I am hopeful under private operation under governmental regulation will enable the roads to be operated both efficiently and economically, insuring a reasonable profit to the owner, steady employment, under good conditions, at an American standard of wages, and a resumption of transportation on a successful basis.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, how much time is left?

The CHAIRMAN. Five minutes.

Mr. GARRETT was recognized.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield to me a minute?

Mr. GARRETT. Certainly.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I want to use that minute to make a statement to the Members of the House as to the reason assigned by Mr. Hines, Director General, for not approving an increase of rates at this time. In the first place he says that we have gone through the four leanest months of the year, and if we attempted to increase the rates of the railroads based upon the earnings during this period it would be entirely unfair and unjust to shippers, taking into consideration the earnings of the railroads during the whole year. That being true, it is unwise to grant such an increase at this time, because railroad rates are basic, and it would increase the cost of raw material, which in turn would increase the cost of living. It was his opinion that a rate increase should be based upon normal conditions and not upon the abnormal conditions which have existed for the past four months. I agree with him.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I think I can satisfy the curiosity of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] on one point, namely, as to why there is a disposition on the Democratic side to resent the continuous criticism of the President of the United States for being abroad. Whatever may have been the opinions of gentlemen, Democrats or Republicans, as to the propriety of the President going abroad, it is a fact that he did go.

Personally, I never saw any impropriety in it. On the contrary, I approved entirely of his going. Had the President of the United States not gone abroad, those whom he would have sent as commissioners would have been continually under his instruction by cable or letter, as has always been the case, and as always must be the case, in negotiating a treaty of peace on the part of this Republic.

I can see no objection whatever to the President going personally upon the ground and directing operations and methods there. On the contrary, there were many reasons why he should have gone.

But, passing that by, without reference to the opinion of men as to the propriety, Democrats do object to and do resent criticism, because when he went he carried with him the fortunes of this Republic. And when we see gentlemen, who in order to discredit him here are willing and anxious to discredit their country before the world, arise to criticize him and continuously criticize him we do resent it, not because of its political aspect but because of our fondness and affection for the glory and greatness of our own country. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] ask unanimous consent to extend and revise their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ANDERSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5312) to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for carrying out the act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation system while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918, and had directed him to report the same back with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 305, nays 4, answered "present" 2, not voting 119, as follows:

We come seeking Thy peace, because we believe that the peace of the world depends upon Thy peace in the hearts of men. We pray that in this place of power we may have the peace of God that passeth all understanding, and that in all our deliberations and utterances we may be guided and controlled and sweetened and blessed by the abiding peace of God in our hearts. PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. EDGE. I present resolutions signed by 15,000 men employed in the New York Shipbuilding Corporation's shipyards at Camden, N. J. I ask that the body of one of the petitions be printed in the RECORD and that they be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

There being no objection, the petitions were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and the body of one of the petitions was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CAMDEN, N. J., April 4, 1919.

Whereas there now exists the necessity of absorbing in employment men being discharged from the Army and Navy service, and also men being discharged from employment in factories which have been producing strictly war materials, it is vitally important at the present time that workmen should be kept employed to the fullest possible extent in the production of useful product; and

Whereas the steady employment of 15,000 men in the New York Shipbuilding Corporation's shipyards, as well as the employment of the great army of men in the entire Delaware River district and the shipyards of the Atlantic and Pacific seaboard, is of vital importance to this locality and the entire United States; and

BRITISH CENSORSHIP OF AMERICAN MAIL.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I wish to present and have printed in the RECORD a very short letter, together with the notations on the envelope, by a business house showing the opening of business letters by the British censor. It is mail going to Norway and Sweden. I believe it shows that the letters are opened and business information extracted and used by our British competitors in the Scandinavian Peninsula to the injury of the business houses in New York City. The same thing is true, I may state, of certain business houses in Chicago doing an export business. I wish to protest against it. I have repeatedly called the attention of the State Department to what I believe to be a violation of the right of censorship under present conditions.

I make this public protest in the hope that it may fortify the Department of State in proper action; and if no immediate relief is had, that we enact some legislation looking to the restriction of British commerce in retaliation. I regard it as a very gross abuse of the power of censorship diverted to private use.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK, June 10, 1919.

Senator SHERMAN,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I inclose herewith two envelopes in which were contained two business letters, which were evidently opened by the English censor. Kindly investigate the matter and inform me, if possible, when the censorship on American mails to their old customers in neutral countries will cease. I consider the present situation outrageous and scandalous.

Any information you will give me will be thankfully received. We have been doing business with our customers in Stockholm, Sweden, for over 30 years.

Yours, truly, L. BEST.

Mr. PHELAN. I desire to have printed as a public document certain papers on the league of nations. I ask that they be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. They will be so referred.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 5312. An act to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for carrying out the act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. CUMMINS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 641, the unfinished business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 641) to amend section 10 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, when the Senate adjourned last evening I was explaining the purpose and effect of the bill now before the Senate. The senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], who, I observe, is not now present in the Chamber, had made objection to that part of the bill—or, rather, that amendment which the committee proposes to the bill—confining it, in its restoration of jurisdiction over rates, to the Interstate Commerce Commission. I said practically all that I desired to say upon that subject in the colloquy between that Senator and myself; but I may observe, further, that it would put the Government of the United States in a very peculiar and a very disagreeable position if we were now to subordinate or subject it to the jurisdiction of the several State commissions with regard to rates. For illustration, if a State were to pass a law, or if a commission of a State were to proclaim rates that in the judgment of the President or of the Railroad Administration were confiscatory, and rates that would not sustain their fair share of the burden of carrying on the entire traffic, it is quite evident that the carrier company could not institute a suit for the purpose of enjoining and finally annulling such rates, for the companies would have no interest whatever in that controversy.

It is equally clear that the Federal Government ought not to be driven to the necessity of instituting suits for the purpose of enjoining the act, direct or indirect, of the State governments. I see no other way to deal with the subject than to allow, in the comparatively short period of Federal control, the right of the administration to institute State rates to remain. But that is a matter, of course, for the final determination of the Congress.

The bill has in it one feature which was not contained in the bill reported to Congress at the last session, and which seemed to meet the general approval of the Members of the Senate, and, indeed, I think, of all the Members of Congress. There is an amendment proposed which prolongs the statutes or orders of limitation respecting the filing of claims with the Interstate Commerce Commission for reparation for overcharges, as you all know, and prolonging the period in which those who have suffered loss or damage in the transportation of persons or property for bringing the suits which are authorized in the act of March, 1918. This has been suggested for a very obvious reason. There have been various orders issued by the Director General of Railroads with regard to the place and the manner of bringing suit for such injuries. The people have not very well understood what their rights really are in that respect.

In view of these well-known facts, it seems to me but fair now to exclude from the time which is to be computed either for filing claims or for bringing suit the period of Federal control; that is to say, to allow these statutes or orders of limitation to begin to run now rather than to begin to run at the time the several causes of action accrued.

I know personally that there has been very great difficulty in adjusting this particular subject in various parts of the country, and I say this without the least implication of any desire to oppress the people in any part of the country. It is one of the natural and inevitable consequences of a transition such as we experienced at the close of the year 1917.

With these observations, I think that I have explained every feature of the bill which is at all material; and I close my remarks by reiterating what I said in the beginning, namely, that the chief purpose—and it is so chief that it may almost be said to be the sole purpose of the proposed legislation—is to restore to the Interstate Commerce Commission the authority which that body had over interstate rates prior to the time that the Government took possession of the railroads, and especially prior to the time we passed the act of 1918.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. The Senator has adverted to the attitude taken yesterday by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] and to the apprehensions which he expressed of the evils which would result from leaving intrastate rates subject to the absolute control, as at present, of the Director General. The thought has occurred to me that perhaps this bill would lead to conflict between the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Director General; that is to say, the Director General would impose rates upon intrastate business that would be entirely at variance with the rates imposed by the Interstate Commerce Commission; that the rates intrastate in character might be very much higher than those imposed by the Interstate Commerce Commission and lead to discrimination and injustice.

Has the Senator thought of any method by which that evil, which may perhaps exist only in our fancy, might be remedied? It is, however, clearly an evil which is possible by the exercise of, perhaps, arbitrary power by the Director General or by the exercise of the power within the authority and prerogatives of the Interstate Commerce Commission, but yet power of such a character in the fixing of rates as would disturb the just equilibrium and ratio which should exist between intra and inter state commerce.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it is hardly possible to conceive such a situation as has been mentioned by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], but I think there is ample power on the part of the Interstate Commerce Commission to deal with it if it should arise. The Senator from Utah will remember that a few years ago the question arose before the Interstate Commerce Commission with regard to a discrimination practiced, as was alleged, by some of the States in the rates which they had established as against interstate commerce, and the general claim was that there must be a fair, reasonable relation between the rates imposed by the State for its own traffic and the rates generally in force governing interstate traffic. That controversy finally reached the Supreme Court of the United States, and it was there held that the Federal Government, as represented in the Interstate Commerce Commission, had authority to bring the rates in these two jurisdictions into proper relation with each other.

Again, a question arose in Minnesota, which finally came to the Supreme Court. The claim there was that the intrastate rates did not bear their fair share of the burden of sustaining the carrier, which was engaged in interstate transportation as well as State transportation. The Supreme Court held that was a proper matter for the exercise of the power of the General Government; that is to say, it held that if intrastate rates were so low that they did not contribute their proper share of the revenues necessary to sustain the carrier, the difficulty could be cured and the remedy provided by the General Government through the Interstate Commerce Commission, although it must be admitted that, as the law is now, the Interstate Commerce Commission has not that full and complete authority which, I have no doubt, will shortly be conferred upon it. I mention these two cases as indicating that the General Government, even under the law as it is, through the Interstate Commerce Commission, can and will maintain the proper relation, or a fair relation, between the rates which are purely intrastate and those which are interstate.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I gave notice on yesterday that at this time I would address the Senate on the covenant for a league of nations and the Constitution.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Beckham	France	Keyes	Robinson
Capper	Frelinghuysen	King	Sheppard
Chamberlain	Gronna	Kirby	Sherman
Culberson	Hale	La Follette	Smith, Ariz.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I find myself the only member present, I believe, of the Committee on Foreign Relations. That committee is now conducting an investigation under a certain resolution of the Senate; they have witnesses from a distance here, and are now in session in the Senate Office Building. I make this statement in explanation of the absence of the Senators engaged in that undertaking.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-four Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. FERNALD, Mr. NEWBERRY, Mr. NORRIS, Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. RANSDELL, and Mr. STERLING answered to their names when called.

Mr. McKELLAR. The senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] is unavoidably detained from the Chamber on important business. I should like to have this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. ROBINSON. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] are detained on official business.

Mr. STANLEY, Mr. NELSON, and Mr. SIMMONS entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

THE COVENANT AND THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, in the general assault upon the plan devised by the statesmen assembled at the peace conference at Versailles for a league of nations to insure the future peace of the world, it is insisted that the covenant submitted is in contravention of the Constitution of the United States and ought, for that reason, to be rejected by the Senate. The people of this country have an intense pride in and a just reverence for their national Constitution, esteeming it at once as the palladium of their rights and liberties and as assuring to them the best government ever contrived by the wit of man. If a well-founded apprehension that any policy runs counter to the commands or restrictions express or implied of the organic law can be excited, it serves often as well as complete demonstration to accomplish its rejection, so axiomatic is it regarded that a course condemned by the Constitution can be neither safe nor wise.

It results, as a consequence of this sensitiveness on the part of the public, that scarcely a measure of great national importance comes before either branch of Congress that is not assailed as being unconstitutional in some vital feature.

In my time as a Member of this body I have listened to protracted arguments attacking, on constitutional grounds, the various bills, among others, which eventually became the Federal reserve law, the Federal Trade Commission law, the Clayton law, the child-labor law, the farm-loan law, the eight-hour law, the espionage act, and the draft act, as well as bills which reached the last stage of legislative consideration for granting franchises for the erection of dams for the generation of power in navigable streams and in waters on the public domain, and for leasing nonmetallic mineral public lands.

Of all the acts passed by Congress in the record-breaking calendar it has made since March 4, 1913, including those induced by the stern necessities of the Great War before and after we became participants in it, only the child-labor act has been condemned by the Supreme Court as in contravention of the Constitution, while it has specifically upheld the eight-hour law, the espionage act, and the draft act. The Circuit Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit recently sustained the trade-commission act, which was vigorously denounced in the course of its passage as violative of established and recognized principles of constitutional law. A former Member of the Senate recently deliberately and formally walked out of the Democratic Party because, as he asserted, it had ceased to be the guardian of the Constitution or to respect its injunctions and restrictions. Yet he pointed to no single act, save as heretofore stated, for which that party was in any sense responsible which had not stood the test of investigation by the courts.

There was a brief period in our history, not so remote, in which the Constitution was interposed, with some degree of success in and out of Congress against every measure intended to restrain predatory wealth or accord to labor some protection in the unequal struggle in which it has become involved because of modern industrial conditions. The more liberal spirit which has come to prevail has provoked no little repining among certain classes over what they conceive to be the decay of our institutions and the impending dissolution of the social order, no less than the disregard of constitutional limitations.

It has become a habit of mind with many who have been compelled reluctantly to accommodate themselves to unwelcome legislation of the character mentioned to see in every innovation some repugnancy to the Constitution, viewed, of course, in the narrow, illiberal spirit in which they have become accustomed to regard it. How far the influences referred to may be operative, how far general opposition to the league of nations, springing from either partisan or patriotic motives, may account for the attitude taken, it is unnecessary, and perhaps it would be futile to inquire, but it is seriously contended that whatever liberty of action may be permitted to other nations, our country, the first among them all in power and in influence, can not, by reason of its peculiar Constitution, enter into the covenant proposed, though it should accomplish all its most ardent and enthusiastic supporters claim for it, though it should usher in the era when—

> The war drum throbs no longer,
> And the battle flags are furled
> In the parliament of man,
> The federation of the world.

This view has not only been advanced in speeches on the floor, but there was introduced into the RECORD a contribution to the press by an eminent jurist of the District of Columbia, and wide circulation has been given to addresses of a former ambassador, a professor of law, in which it is elaborately supported.

More recently an address by a Federal judge, asserting that the covenant contravenes the Constitution, was made a part of the RECORD, and on yesterday a resolution was presented by the junior Senator from Pennsylvania, formerly Attorney General of the United States and later Secretary of State, in which the league is denounced and the demand is made that the covenant be separated from the other provisions of the treaty, one paragraph of the resolution, evidently aimed at the covenant, being as follows:

> That since the people of the United States have themselves determined and provided in their Constitution the only ways in which the Constitution may be amended, and since amendment by treaty stipulation is not one of the methods which the people have so prescribed, the treaty-making power of the United States has no authority to make a treaty which in effect amends the Constitution of the United States, and the Senate of the United States can not advise and consent to any treaty provision which would have such effect if enforced.

The basis of the recital from this high authority that the treaty of which the covenant forms a part is inconsistent with the Constitution will be referred to later.

Journals of wide circulation and more or less influence, antagonistic to the league, have assumed, without any attempt at demonstration, that the contention so made is confessedly sound, and that, as one such at least has expressed it, radical amendments of our organic law will be necessary before the United States can enter into the league. The eminent Senator from Massachusetts in the debate with President Lowell, of Harvard, which attracted wide notice, pursued this easy method of disputation, and having assumed the antagonism to be indisputable, added: "No doubt we could amend our Constitution to fit the league, but it would take some time."

The comment just made is offered lest, in view of the history of our country, to which reference will be made, this effort to refute the contention thus advanced might be deemed a work of pedantic supererogation.

BASIS OF CLAIM.

In the main it is founded upon the claim that by the treaty, of which the league is a constituent feature, in the making of which the House of Representatives has no part, our country becomes obligated in a way in which it can be bound, or becomes committed to a course or policy upon which it can enter only through the action of Congress—that is to say, the concurrent action of both Houses of the national legislature. It is particularly urged that the covenant obligates us to wage war in certain contingencies, while the Constitution (Art I, sec. 8) declares that "Congress shall have power to declare war." The proposition is extravagantly expressed by some as an attempt to transfer the power to declare war from Congress to the league.

In an address delivered in the Senate on December 18 last by the junior Senator from Pennsylvania the question was raised by the following inquiry and comment:

> "Suppose that it were proposed that the United States should bind itself in advance by treaty to go to war in given circumstances. Under the Constitution war can be declared only by the Congress. How could the President, by negotiating a treaty, and the Senate, by consenting to its ratification, bind this country to declare war? A declaration of war is, under the Constitution, a prerogative of the Congress. The appropriations to initiate or to conduct war are in the discretion of the Congress."

It will be noted that the Senator, whose acknowledged ability as well as his experience as Attorney General and Secretary of State give to his utterances on the subject he was discussing unusual weight, did not unequivocally commit himself to the view that the treaty-making power is not sufficiently broad to warrant a convention obligating the Nation to make war, either presently or upon a future contingency, yet the casual reader, and especially one disinclined, for any reason, to give the league his support, would unquestionably receive the impression from the language quoted that the Senator subscribed to and had announced that doctrine.

SUCH A TREATY NOT UNIQUE.

In this connection an incident in our diplomatic history, presently to be referred to, is illuminating. The covenant does undoubtedly, should the treaty be signed, obligate this country to make war. Article 10, frequently referred to, reads as follows:

> The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve, as against external aggression, the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league. In case of any such aggression, or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression, the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

That plainly means that if the territory of any member is invaded or threatened by the military forces of any other nation within or without the league, all other members thereof will come to its assistance to repel the aggressor and coerce him into keeping the peace. It may be that commercial pressure and isolation contemplated by other provisions of the covenant may be found effective to restrain a threatened or anticipated military movement directed at a member of the league, but all efforts less drastic failing, the obligation can be honorably discharged only by joining our forces with those of the threatened or invaded country and of the other nations obligated with us and making war upon the disturber of the general peace.

Much eloquence has been expended in denunciation of this feature of the league, but it is the soul and spirit of the covenant. Cut it out and the heart is cut out of the only plan the statesmanship of the world has been able to devise or has ever been able to offer for the preservation of the peace of the world, as a substitute for the system which has again exhibited itself to an agonized world as a colossal and yet miserable failure, but to which some Senators still exhibit a fatuous attachment. It is true, beyond doubt, that that article obligates us to make war. But we have not hesitated heretofore to assume a like obligation. We entered into a treaty with the Republic of Panama, the first article of which is as follows:

ART. 1. The United States guarantees and will maintain the independence of the Republic of Panama.

No one can doubt the significance of that undertaking. We go to war with any country that attempts to reduce the republic through whose concession we built the Panama Canal. That treaty was entered into in the year 1904, the late Theodore Roosevelt being President of the United States and PHILANDER C. KNOX, now a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania, his Attorney General and official legal adviser. Whatever view may now be entertained by the latter, it is quite evident that in 1904, at least, he harbored no serious doubt of the binding character of a treaty under which the United States became obligated to resort to the dread arbitrament of war. It would be doing him, as well as the President of the United States who negotiated the treaty, a gross injustice to imagine that they accepted the grant of the Canal Zone upon the considerations named in the treaty, the first in importance to the feeble young Republic of Panama being the guarantee of its independence, if either of them at the time conceived that there was any doubt of the authority of the President and the Senate in the exercise of the treaty-making power so to bind the Nation. The comment of the Senator above quoted may well arouse apprehensions on the part of the Government and people of Panama which, in view of his relation to the treaty, he will doubtless hasten to still, if his further study of the subject will permit, by the assurance that whatever doubts he may have entertained in the month of December last concerning the binding character of article 1 of the treaty of 1904, they have, on further reflection, been resolved in favor of the view that it is a solemn obligation of the United States entered into in conformity with the Constitution.

It is persuasive that though the treaty referred to was, at the time it was negotiated, the subject of heated controversy, the right of the President and the Senate under the Constitution to obligate the Nation, as recited in article 1, was questioned by no one, so far as the report of the public debates in relation to the treaty discloses, though there were then in the Senate many profound lawyers, life-long students of the Constitution, including Senators Bacon, Hoar, and Spooner.

Among those voting to ratify it were the following, still Members of the Senate: Senators LODGE, MCCUMBER, NELSON, PENROSE, SIMMONS, SMOOT, and WARREN. It was not without precedent in assuming that there was no transgression of the Constitution in the treaty. In the year 1846 a treaty was concluded with the Republic of New Granada, in which, mention having been made of means of transportation across the Isthmus of Panama and certain concessions in relation thereto granted to the United States, our Government subscribed to the undertaking, evidenced by the following clause thereof:

And in order to secure to themselves the tranquil and constant enjoyment of these advantages, and as an especial compensation for the said advantages and for the favors they have acquired by the fourth, fifth, and sixth articles of this treaty, the United States guarantee, positively and efficaciously, to New Granada, by the present stipulation, the perfect neutrality of the before-mentioned Isthmus, with the view that the free transit from the one to the other sea may not be interrupted or embarrassed in any future time while this treaty exists; and, in consequence, the United States also guarantee in the same manner the rights of sovereignty and property which New Granada has and possesses over the said territory.

At the time of the ratification of that treaty Webster, Benton, Calhoun, and Clayton were Members of the Senate. None of them, so far as history discloses, had any misgivings concerning the power of the President and the Senate thus to agree for the Nation.

Webster had only recently returned after quitting the post of Secretary of State. Shortly thereafter, in the course of a speech delivered in the Senate, he referred to the provision of the treaty above quoted and alluded to it as a binding obligation of the Government, saying:

This Government, looking upon this stipulation as a benefit obtained, a boon conceded by the Government of New Granada, as an equivalent for this consideration, entered on its part into an engagement to protect and guarantee and defend the neutrality of this whole Isthmus This will be seen by reference to the thirty-fifth article of the treaty, which will be found in the volume of the laws of the last session. It is there very distinctly stated. There is no question about it. We are under treaty obligations to maintain the neutrality of this Isthmus and the authority of the Government of New Granada over it.

Senators who insistently protest against the league because the covenant under which it is to operate obligates each member to come to the aid of any that may be attacked by another nation—an obligation which contemplates the waging of war—but into which, it is asserted, this Government can not consistently with the Constitution enter, constitute themselves the special champions of the Monroe doctrine, the maintenance of which they aver to be essential to the preservation of the national integrity. With repeated professions of their devotion to America and her institutions, carrying faintly the suggestion that it is of a quality superior to that of those who differ with them concerning the wisdom of entering into the league, they proclaim that the Monroe doctrine must be upheld at all cost. But what is the Monroe doctrine but a voluntary obligation assumed by the United States to "respect and preserve as against external aggression"—external in this case signifying transoceanic—the Republics of South and Central America? It may be more, but it is at least that. If we were to enter into a treaty with Brazil, say these expounders of the Constitution, by which, upon some consideration moving to us, we undertook to "preserve as against external aggression" her "territorial integrity and existing political independence," it would be a void act, but we are even now bound to do so without a treaty under peril of national obliteration.

The Monroe doctrine lends itself easily to oratory. It was the theme of the most eloquent address delivered in the Senate in many years, so moving in its appeal to an intense nationalism as to evoke the unrestrained plaudits of the listening Senate in disregard of its traditions and of the galleries that went unrebuked by common consent. The peroration was in the nature of a tribute to the late President Roosevelt, whose Americanism was justly exalted and in whose name the orator called upon his associates to denounce before the country any league of nations as essentially at war with the ideas for which his hero stood. But he seemed to have overlooked, as those who followed his advice would have learned with embarrassment from an informed public, that Theodore Roosevelt was long ago committed to the very policy against which his name was invoked. In his speech accepting the Nobel prize at Christiania, in 1910, he said:

It would be a master stroke if those great powers honestly bent on peace would form a league of peace, not only to keep the peace among themselves, but to prevent, by force if necessary, its being broken by others. The supreme difficulty in connection with developing the peace work of The Hague arises from the lack of any executive power, of any police power, to enforce the decrees of the courts.

And in a letter printed in the New York Times October 18, 1914, he indorsed more specifically the essential principles of the plan now submitted for the approval of the world in the following language:

The one permanent move for obtaining peace, which has yet been suggested, with any reasonable chance of attaining its object, is by an agreement among the great powers, in which each should pledge itself not only to abide by the decisions of a common tribunal but to back with force the decision of that common tribunal. The great civilized nations of the world which do possess force, actual or immediately potential, should combine by solemn agreement in a great world league for the peace of righteousness. * * *

They should, furthermore, agree not only to abide, each of them, by the decision of the court, but all of them to unite with their military forces to enforce the decree of the court as against any recalcitrant member. Under these circumstances it would be possible to agree on a limitation of armaments that would be real and effective.

Apparently his courageous heart did not shrink from the task of keeping the world at peace, nor was his virile mind disturbed by doubts as to the power of our country under the Constitution to play its part therein.

HISTORY OF THE CONTENTION.

The controversy over the limitations of the treaty-making power of the Government or of the Executive and the Senate, now renewed, is as old, almost, as the Constitution. It was precipitated by the famous Jay treaty, negotiated in 1794, during the administration of President Washington, and was then disposed of in a way that ought to have been regarded as a final interment of the contention that is the subject of this discussion. Like Banquo's ghost, however, it will not down. It has again and again been urged that in all cases in which, by the Constitution, the action of Congress is necessary—that is to say, participation by the House of Representatives is essential in order that the treaty may be carried out and its obligations discharged—the Executive and the Senate are without authority to enter into the treaty, wanting the concurrence of the House, or the subject altogether transcends the treaty-making power of the Government. The contention has been uniformly rejected, but it renews its youthful vigor from time to time and is urged with all the ardor that ordinarily attends a first presentation, and without the slightest reference to or regard for its unfortunate history.

A Member was one day in the midst of a protracted discussion, in which he was assailing the constitutionality of a measure under consideration, when he was interrupted by another, who called his attention to the fact that the Supreme Court had 75 years before decided the question at issue adversely to his contention. He remarked simply that he disagreed with the court, and proceeded with his argument.

The Jay treaty gave rise to much acrimonious discussion in the country while it was before the Senate; feeling in respect to it, more or less partisan in character, ran high, but it was eventually ratified by a bare two-thirds vote. It provided for the appointment of various commissions to adjust boundary disputes and to report on claims growing out of the War for Independence. In due course, on the exchange of ratifications, bills were introduced in the House of Representatives making appropriations to meet the salaries of the commissioners so appointed and the other expenses attendant on their labors. Thereupon the contention heretofore adverted to was made, that inasmuch as the treaty could not be carried out without action by the House, it remained in the stage of negotiation until the approval of that body was accorded it, that any nation dealing with ours was bound to take notice of the limitation on the treaty-making power thus asserted, so that no breach of national faith could be charged if the House withheld its approval, and that the duty devolved upon that body to enter into an inquiry as to the wisdom of the still imperfect treaty submitted to it. This view secured the adherence of a majority of the House, which adopted a resolution calling upon the President for the correspondence and documents relating or leading to the treaty. President Washington declined to submit the papers, saying in a dignified reply made to the request of the House, "It is perfectly clear to my understanding that the assent of the House of Representatives is not necessary to the validity of a treaty." Among other reasons advanced by him impelling his mind to that conclusion, he observed:

> Having been a member of the general convention, and knowing the principles on which the Constitution was formed, I have ever entertained but one opinion on this subject; and from the first establishment of the Government to this moment my conduct has exemplified that opinion—that the power of making treaties is exclusively vested in the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and that every treaty so made and promulgated thenceforward became the law of the land. It is thus that the treaty-making power has been understood by foreign nations, and in all the treaties made with them we have declared and they have believed that when ratified by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, they became obligatory. In this construction of the Constitution every House of Representatives has heretofore acquiesced, and until the present time not a doubt or suspicion has appeared, to my knowledge, that this construction was not the true one. Nay, they have more than acquiesced; for till now, without controverting the obligation of such treaties, they have made all the requisite provisions for carrying them into effect.

The debate on the bills was renewed on the receipt of the President's reply, his position being eloquently championed by Fisher Ames, of Massachusetts. A resolution that the legislation ought to be enacted was carried by a close vote, and the bills were duly passed.

The baselessness of the contention appeared so obvious to Chancellor Kent that, referring to the resolution of April 7, 1796, heretofore adverted to, in his commentaries he said:

> It can not be mentioned at this day without equal regret and astonishment that such a resolution passed the House of Representatives.

The discussion of the subject was renewed over the Louisiana Purchase treaty. A like resolution was introduced in the House, which was called upon to make provision for the payment of the purchase price of the vast domain ceded by France, $15,000,000, but it was defeated, the Federalists leading in the contention that it was the right and the duty of the House to inquire into the merits of the treaty, as the Republicans, by which name the party of Jefferson was then known, had led in opposition to the Jay treaty. The historian does not hesitate to assign partisan bias as the moving influence in each instance for the attitude of those who insisted that the treaty was void or inchoate, wanting the approval of the House of Representatives, and the circumstance that the leaders of each of the parties of that day took a position in 1803 the very reverse of that they assumed in 1796 leaves little doubt of the justice of the judgment thus passed upon their official acts.

The chronicler of the events of our fateful day will not fail to note how statesmen who, scarcely more than three years ago, when the hope was reasonably indulged by them that the treaty of peace presently to be submitted to us would be negotiated during a Republican administration, extolled the plan of a league of nations to preserve the peace of the world, then contemplated as an integral part of the treaty, as worthy of all praise, a consummation most devoutly to be wished, now that it comes as the result of the labors of a Democratic President, denounce it as an abomination.

The resolution looking to an inquiry by the House of Representatives into the course of the negotiations resulting in the treaty with France having been disposed of, it quickly recognized the binding force thereof, the obligation which, through it, had been incurred by the Nation, and passed the necessary legislation for the liquidation of the debt.

The controversy was renewed, however, in 1816 over the commercial treaty with Great Britain; in 1834 in connection with a later treaty with France; in 1867 after the treaty with Russia ceding Alaska; in 1887 while the Hawaiian treaty was before the Senate; in 1899 over the treaty with Spain, by which the Philippines were acquired; and, in a mild way, in 1904, when the treaty with Panama was being considered.

SUBJECT NOT EXCLUDED FROM TREATY-MAKING POWER BECAUSE CONGRESS EMPOWERED TO LEGISLATE CONCERNING IT.

A number of the treaties referred to called for large appropriations to pay for territory acquired; others required legislation modifying our tariff and tonnage laws; others, as heretofore pointed out, bound us in defensive alliances, contemplating in each case war against the enemy of the other party to the treaty. In no case has Congress ever declined to pass the necessary legislation to make effective or to carry into execution the treaty.

It is of no consequence that the treaty deals with a subject with reference to which Congress is given power to legislate. The President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is, by the Constitution, given power to make treaties which, with the Constitution and laws of the United States made in pursuance of it, are the supreme law of the land, as the Constitution declares.

It has been held by the Supreme Court so often that reference to specific cases is unnecessary, that a treaty in conflict with a prior act of Congress repeals it, and, e converso, that a later act of Congress inconsistent with a treaty renders it nugatory, the later law prevailing. There could, of course, be no conflict if the two did not occupy the same field.

> By the Constitution a treaty is placed on the same footing and made of like obligation with an act of legislation. Both are declared by that instrument to be the supreme law of the land, and no superior efficacy is given to either over the other. (Whitney v. Robertson, 124 U. S., 190.)

The theory that the treaty-making power does not extend to any subject with reference to which power is vested in Congress, if it ever was seriously maintained, was long ago exploded. I can not hope to expose its utter weakness with anything like the eloquence or lucidity with which the task was discharged by Hon. James Barbour, a Senator from Virginia, in the great debate on the commercial treaty with Great Britain in 1816. I submit, however, a few observations in that connection.

The constitution gives to Congress power to legislate with reference to foreign commerce, but this does not mean that the President may not, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, enter into commercial treaties. The Constitutional Convention clearly contemplated that such treaties would come within the power it proposed to confer upon the President and the Senate, since it rejected a proposition to require the assent of two-thirds of all the members of the Senate for the ratification of commercial treaties, though the concurrence of two-thirds of those present would suffice in the case of other treaties. Commercial treaties have been negotiated with nearly every civilized country, dealing with a multiplicity of questions affecting transactions in foreign commerce, in most instances either requiring action by Congress or stipulating against its action or constraining it to action along prescribed lines.

So Congress is given power by the first clause of section 8 of Article I of the Constitution to lay and collect duties, which further provides that all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives. Yet by the Louisiana Purchase treaty it was stipulated that for 12 years the ships of France or Spain entering any of the ports of the ceded territory should be required to pay only such tonnage charges and duties upon their cargoes as should be exacted of the ships and citizens of the United States, and that such privileges should be extended to no other nation.

By article 1 of the treaty with Cuba, proclaimed December 17, 1903, it is provided that all products of that country then admitted to the United States free of duty should thereafter, so long as the treaty stood, be so admitted without payment of any duty, and by article 2 of the same treaty the United States bound itself to admit all other products of the young Republic with a differential in its favor of 20 per cent. An examination of the record discloses that among those voting to ratify that treaty was the senior Senator from Massachusetts, who, in the debate with President Lowell, told his auditors that the treaty embracing the league covenant, "because the tariff is involved in the article for the boycott" and because it allows other nations to "meddle with our tariff," "runs up against a provision of the Constitution" which "provides that all revenue bills shall originate in the House of Representatives." The covenant contemplates that instead of resorting to war to coerce a recalcitrant nation commercial pressure or commercial isolation may be resolved upon by the league. If it recommends that course, the Nation binds itself to lay an embargo, a procedure expressly held by the Supreme Court more than a hundred years ago to be within the power of Congress to direct. The tariff is only remotely involved, if involved at all. By what provision of the covenant do we permit foreign nations to "meddle" with our tariff? It is difficult to conceive how our tariff could come before the league for consideration. It is a domestic question expressly excluded from those with which the league deals, distinctively a matter of domestic policy which each nation has heretofore solved without question as to its right under international law to do so, in accordance with its own views of its interest. Our tariff has never yet brought us to the threshold of war with any country. If we do not discriminate against any particular nation, and our commercial treaties forbid us to do so, even if our settled policy did not, how can any complain? We have, as stated, repeatedly made treaties by which, in consideration of reciprocal advantages they respectively accorded us, bound ourselves that Congress would not exercise its full powers with reference to the tariff, so extensive as to permit our Government to reward its friends and punish its enemies through discriminatory duties. In that sense we have permitted foreign nations in the past to "meddle" with our tariff. It would seem that even the New England mind could not be quite so supersensitive on the subject of the tariff as to be alarmed at the bare suggestion of "meddling" with it on the part of the league.

Again, the Constitution invests Congress with the power to "raise and support armies" and to "provide and maintain a navy," but that does not preclude the President and the Senate, in the exercise of the treaty-making power, from entering into a treaty limiting the size or nature of our Military Establishment or the number of ships we shall maintain as a part of our Navy or the particular waters in which they may be stationed. We have, in fact, entered into a treaty with Great Britain, scrupulously observed for over a century, not to keep on the Great Lakes more than a limited number of armed vessels, fitted only for police and like duties appertaining to the collection of revenue, a reciprocal agreement having been entered into by the British Government on behalf of Canada. Despite repeated assaults upon that convention it remains a solemn obligation of this Government, as was conclusively demonstrated a few days ago by the eloquent junior Senator from Arizona. There would seem to be no reason why we might not enter into a reciprocal treaty under which both countries interested would undertake not to maintain military posts along the great international boundary line between this country and Canada, a policy that has been pursued by each since early in the last century without a treaty.

Congress is empowered to make laws in relation to the naturalization of aliens, but in perhaps every treaty through which any addition was made to our territory stipulations are found through which the subjects or citizens of the State making the cession, residing in the newly acquired territory, were admitted to citizenship. Such wholesale citizenship was conferred upon the inhabitants of Florida by the treaty of cession with Spain ratified in 1821. The United States even obligated itself by that treaty to admit Florida into the Union as one of the States.

Congress is authorized to make all needful rules and regulations concerning the territory and other property of the United States. We negotiated a treaty with Japan, Russia, and Great Britain by which the United States, in order to conserve the fur-seal herd, whose breeding grounds are on the Pribylof Islands, from extinction through pelagic sealing carried on by the citizens or subjects of those countries, agreed to kill annually the mature bachelor seals resorting to the islands and to divide the skins in proportions specified in the treaty between the nations named and our own, they and we agreeing to make pelagic sealing criminal. It may be that the seals in the sea are feræ naturæ, belonging to no one, but we have all the incidents of ownership in them while they are on the breeding grounds, the property of the United States.

Is there any doubt that a treaty could be made with Great Britain by which this country should make an island in Lake Superior a bird refuge, if she should devote an adjacent island on her side to the same purpose, or with Mexico to the effect that if she would establish a refuge for migratory birds wintering in her territory we would set apart certain territory in Alaska for their protection on which they make their summer home?

Note that the provision of the Constitution gives to Congress power not only to make all needful laws respecting the territory, but as well respecting other property of the United States. We have a treaty with Great Britain concerning the use of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal and another concerning the use of the Panama Canal. In all the heated controversy over the subject of the tolls, participated in by the ablest lawyers in America, no one ventured to contend that the treaty is void because dealing with a subject with reference to which Congress is given power to legislate.

The position that a subject is beyond the treaty-making power because within the powers granted to Congress is utterly indefensible and need be no longer noticed.

Heretofore one of the most distinguished expositors of this theory of our Constitution, now so eagerly embraced by the opponents of the league, was a German jurist—Dr. Ernest Meier, a professor in one of the universities of his country, who in a volume of his lectures commented as follows:

> Congress has, under the Constitution, the right to lay taxes and imposts, as well as to regulate foreign trade, but the President and the Senate, if the "treaty-making power" be regarded as absolute, would be able to evade this limitation by adopting treaties which would compel Congress to destroy its whole tariff system. According to the Constitution, Congress has the right to determine questions of naturalization, of patents, and of copyright. Yet, according to the view here contested, the President and Senate, by a treaty, could on these important questions utterly destroy the legislative capacity of the House of Representatives. The Constitution gives Congress the control of the Army. Participation in this control would be snatched from the House of Representatives by a treaty with a foreign power by which the United States would bind itself to keep in the field an army of a particular size. The Constitution gives Congress the right of declaring war; this right would be illusory if the President and Senate could by a treaty launch the country into a foreign war. The power of borrowing money on the credit of the United States resides in Congress; this power would cease to exist if the President and Senate could by treaty bind the country to the borrowing of foreign funds. By the Constitution "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law"; but this limitation would cease to exist if by a treaty the United States could be bound to pay money to a foreign power. * * * Congress would cease to be the lawmaking power as is prescribed by the Constitution; the lawmaking power would be the President and the Senate. Such a condition would become the more dangerous from the fact that treaties so adopted, being on this particular hypothesis superior to legislation, would continue in force until superseded by other treaties. Not only, therefore, would a Congress consisting of two Houses be made to give way to an oligarchy of President and Senate, but the decrees of this oligarchy, when once made, could only be changed by concurrence of President and of senatorial majority of two-thirds.

The war has demonstrated how feebly the German mind has been able to comprehend the American character or the American system. The evils he foresees may, indeed, ensue, but none of them ever have befallen us, and the probability of our experiencing them is too remote to prompt us to revise our Constitution because of the defects and dangers he so generously points out. His apprehensions are quite like those that the opponents of the Constitution sought to arouse when it was before the people for ratification. The dangers inherent in the treaty-making power were a fruitful theme in those days. Indeed, the Constitutional Convention was not without a keen sense of the tremendous nature of the authority it was extending to the Executive and the Senate through the few brief words in which it is conveyed. But it rightly concluded that a compact with a foreign government which commanded the support of the President and two-thirds of the Senate could scarcely be inimical to the welfare of the Union, so far as enlightened public opinion could discern the national interest, and that it was scarcely conceivable that such concert could be secured for a policy that was violative of or destructive to American ideals.

LIMITATIONS ON TREATY-MAKING POWER CONSIDERED.

But it is asserted that though the treaty-making power may be vast it is not unlimited. Undoubtedly so. It is said to be impossible to frame a power of attorney in terms so general as not to be subject to implied limitations. Whatever the limitations on the treaty-making power, they are implied; none whatever are expressed. "He [the President] shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators concur," is the simple language of the Constitution. Nothing is excluded in express terms. No particular kind of treaties is specified, so that all kinds are included—treaties of alliance, offensive and defensive, commercial treaties, extradition treaties, arbitration treaties.

In the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States (Hauenstein v. Lynham, 100 U. S., 483) the following is quoted with approval from a speech delivered in the House of Representatives by William Pinkney, of Maryland:

> The word "treaties" is nomen generalissimum and will comprehend commercial treaties, unless there be a limit upon it by which they are excluded. It is the appellative, which will take in the whole species, if there be nothing to limit its scope. There is no such limit. There is not a syllable in the context of the clause to restrict the natural import of its phraseology. The power is left to the force of the generic term and is therefore as wide as a treaty-making power can be. It embraces all the varieties of treaties which it could be supposed this Government could find it necessary or proper to make, or it embraces none. It covers the whole treaty-making ground which this Government could be expected to occupy, or not an inch of it.
> It is a just presumption that it was designed to be coextensive with all the exigencies of our affairs. Usage sanctions that presumption—expediency does the same. The omission of any exception to the power, the omission of the designation of a mode by which a treaty not intended to be included within it might otherwise be made, confirms it.

Reliance is placed upon the language of Justice Field in Geofroy v. Riggs (133 U. S., 258–267), as follows:

> The treaty power, as expressed in the Constitution, is in terms unlimited except by those restraints which are found in that instrument against the action of the Government or of its departments, and those arising from the nature of the Government itself and of that of the States. It would not be contended that it extends so far as to authorize what the Constitution forbids, or a change in the character of the Government or in that of one of the States, or a cession of any portion of the territory of the latter, without its consent.

Which is followed by this sentence:

> But with these exceptions it is not perceived that there is any limit to the questions which can be adjusted touching any matter which is properly the subject of negotiation with a foreign country.

With much diffidence, but with the utmost confidence, I venture to assert that the territory of a State may either in whole or in part be ceded under the treaty power without its consent, though the dictum of the learned justice is supported by the authority of other great names. Had Mexico listened to the lure of the Zimmermann-Eckhardt note, joined her fortunes with those of Germany in an effort to regain the "lost provinces," and under the stern compulsion of a dictated peace following a decisive victory of Wilhelm and his allies a treaty was signed by the President and ratified by the Senate ceding to Mexico Texas, New Mexico, and Arizona, can anyone doubt the efficacy of the act to transfer the sovereignty over that imperial domain to our prudent neighbor to the south which wisely ignored the invitation? Would it be asserted, for instance, that thereafter a Federal court could continue to function within the region affected, that the United States revenue officers could continue to discharge their duties therein as theretofore, and that their acts would be recognized by our courts as valid because the treaty was without constitutional warrant? Could the Secretary of the Interior be mandamused to issue a patent to lands therein to one otherwise becoming entitled to it? To my mind, it is of no consequence that the President and the Senate may have yielded their assent in order to save from subjection the remainder of the country or to preserve it from desolation. Manifestly an overweening necessity must be assumed to imagine such an exercise of the treaty-making power, but who is to judge of the necessity, who shall say when conditions are sufficiently grave to justify such a treaty? Obviously not the courts, and equally obvious is it that the determination rests with the President and the Senate.

What good reason is there to doubt that an exchange might be effected by treaty of islands lying off our coast, one being within the jurisdiction of one of the States of the Union, but devoted wholly to national uses, the other more suitable to our purposes belonging to the other party to the treaty? Assume the case of two islands in Puget Sound or the Strait of San Juan de Fuca, both uninhabited, the one a part of the State of Washington, and consequently of the United States, and the other within the jurisdiction of British Columbia. She is willing to exchange, and the National Government is desirous of acquiring her island with a view to devoting it to the better protection of that coast against an enemy or some purpose connected with the safer navigation of those waters. Can the State of Washington veto the transfer? It is unreasonable that she should; but is the rest of the country at the mercy of her whim? If the island were densely populated and the inhabitants adverse to going under foreign dominion, in all reasonable probability the President and the Senate would yield unhesitatingly to their desires. But that aspect of the case presents the question of the wisdom or justice of making and not to the power to make the treaty.

Without attempting to specify, I may say that considerations similar to those here advanced have led statesmen and jurists of no less eminence than those announcing a contrary view to the conclusion that under the treaty-making power even the territory of one of the States of the Union may be transferred to a foreign power.

In the adjustment of the northeast boundary dispute the formal assent of Maine and Massachusetts was secured, not because of the surrender of territory over which they asserted jurisdiction, for Massachusetts could claim none, but because they owned in common lands within the region which under the Webster-Ashburton treaty went to New Brunswick, as will appear from the speech of Mr. Webster in justification of the compromise, made on his reentry into the Senate.

This particular inquiry is in the nature of a digression from the general subject. It has been followed to perhaps unpardonable length only to make more clear the very comprehensive character of the treaty-making power conferred by the Constitution.

But, whatever the limitations on the treaty-making power may be, they obviously do not embrace undertakings such as article 10 of the covenant, in effect, as pointed out, a treaty of alliance under which the United States is obligated to go to the aid of any member of the league attacked by another nation contrary to the covenant. Alliances were, and for centuries had been, common among the nations of the earth at the time the Constitution was adopted. The right to enter into such inheres in a sovereign independent State. The Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled having proclaimed, in the Declaration of Independence, that the Colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States, continued that as such "they have full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances," and "do all other acts and things which independent States may of right do."

An alliance in international law is—

> A union or association of two or more States or nations, formed by league or treaty, for the joint prosecution of a war or for their mutual protection in repelling hostile attacks. (Black's Law Dictionary.)

Bouvier has the following definition of the term and comment thereon:

> In international law: A contract, treaty, or league between two or more sovereigns or States made for purposes of aggression or defense.
> Defensive alliances are those in which a nation agrees to defend her ally in case the latter is attacked. Offensive alliances are those in which nations unite for the purpose of making an attack or jointly waging war against another nation.

A modern writer on international law says:

> Alliances in the strict sense of the term are treaties of union between two or more States for the purpose of defending each other against an attack in war or jointly attacking third States or for both purposes.—Oppenheim.

It is inconceivable that the founders of our Government should, at its birth, specifically assert the right of the United States as an independent Nation to contract alliances and that they then contrived a Constitution which disabled the Nation from so contracting. As is well known, having declared their right so to do, they proceeded without delay to enter into a treaty of alliance with France. Some provisions of this treaty are interesting in this connection. Article 1 as follows:

> If war should break out between France and Great Britain during the continuance of the present war between the United States and England, His Majesty and the said United States shall make it a common cause and aid each other mutually with their good offices, their counsels, and their forces, according to the exigence of conjunctures, as becomes good and faithful allies.

Article 8 as follows:

> Neither of the two parties shall conclude either truce or peace with Great Britain without the formal consent of the other first obtained; and they mutually engage not to lay down their arms until the independence of the United States shall have been formally or tacitly assured by the treaty or treaties that shall terminate the war.

Article 11, in part, as follows:

> The two parties guarantee mutually from the present time and forever against all powers, to wit: The United States to His Most Christian Majesty, the present possessions of the Crown of France in America, as well as those which it may acquire by the future treaty of peace. And His Most Christian Majesty guarantees on his part to the United States their liberty, sovereignty, and independence. (I Treaties and Conventions, pp. 480–481.)

This treaty was in full force and vigor at the time the Constitution was drafted and adopted. It gave rise to universal rejoicing at the time it was effected, and retained, when the convention was engaged in its labors and throughout the stormy period that preceded the adoption of the Constitution, a high place in popular favor. The excesses of the French Revolution which followed speedily were largely responsible for the determination later arrived at and concurred in by nearly all our leading statesmen, to disregard some of its obligations, speedily condoned by France, which in a spirit of continued amity and with a quickened sense of a common interest ceded Louisiana to our country under Napoleon. There is no doubt that it was the distressing experience we had had with this treaty with France that led Washington to warn his countrymen in his Farewell Address against "entangling alliances." It will be remembered that in the same connection he descanted upon the unwisdom of entertaining either excessive love or excessive hatred toward any nation, having in mind the prevailing intensity of feeling with regard to France on the one hand and Great Britain on the other, growing out of the War for Independence.

It is unnecessary to say that if in the opinion of Washington, and Hamilton, it might be added, for the latter undoubtedly collaborated in the preparation of the address, the treaty-making power did not, under the Constitution, extend to alliances offensive or defensive, or both, there would have been no occasion to give the warning of which so much has been heard in this debate. The revered statesman who was president of the convention which framed the Constitution would have contented himself with an admonition to observe scrupulously the fundamental law, and a reminder to his readers that it forbade treaties of alliance.

The senior Senator from Massachusetts was quite right when he said, in an address delivered in May, 1916, before the League to Enforce Peace, giving his cordial approval to its general plan and purpose—

> I do not believe that when Washington warned us against entangling alliances he meant for one moment that we should not join with other civilized nations of the world if a method could be found to diminish war and encourage peace.

Some explanation is due his colleagues and the country of how he came to abandon the idea so clearly expressed, to embrace the view that, by the work of the hard-headed statesmen at Paris, in execution of the plan he then approved, "we are," as he told the Senate on February 25 last, "invited to move away from George Washington to the other end of the line, at which stands the sinister figure of Trotski, the champion of internationalism."

Washington was in his day the victim of vilification so coarse and relentless that the story can scarcely be believed by the modern reader, and it is hardly to be expected that Wilson would escape vituperation and abuse from his political antagonists. Though this shaft was aimed at him it carries the accusation as well at Lloyd-George and Clemenceau, Orlando, and Makino, with the representatives of some dozen other civilized States at the peace conference, all of whom must share with President Wilson the responsibility of so much of internationalism as is found in the league and so much of odium as follows from being classed as disciples of Trotski. In that aspect the merit of the remark is chiefly in its rhetoric.

Article 10 is unassailable on constitutional grounds. In its substantive part it is to all intents and purposes a treaty of alliance. It concludes: "In case of any threat or danger of such aggression the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled." The purpose of this clause is obviously to secure concert of action, but it is left to each nation to determine for itself, the recommendation of the council notwithstanding, whether the occasion calls for action in fulfillment of its obligation and how that obligation ought to be discharged.

Under article 16 each member undertakes that it will, should any other resort to war in disregard of articles 12, 13, or 14, immediately interdict all trade or financial relations with the nations of the covenant-breaking State—that is, institute a complete embargo against the offending State. In such a case it becomes the duty of the council to "recommend to the several governments concerned what effective military and naval forces the members of the league shall severally contribute to the armaments of forces to be used to protect the covenants of the league," the obligation to make war in such case arising, if at all, by virtue of the covenant of article 10. Again, the only power the council has in the premises is to recommend what contribution each nation should make, that a recalcitrant may be reduced should a resort to arms be necessary.

NO DELEGATION OF AUTHORITY TO DECLARE WAR.

A careful study of the covenant will reveal that neither the council nor the assembly has any power to declare war or even to call upon the members to make war, unless the authority to issue such a call and the obligation to respond is implied in the first section of article 11, as follows:

> Any war or threat of war, whether immediately affecting any of the members of the league or not, is hereby declared a matter of concern to the whole league, and the league shall take any action that may be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace of nations.

At most the language quoted can not be construed to grant any more extensive authority than is reposed in the council under article 10 should a war of aggression be prosecuted by a member of the league, namely, to advise upon the means by which it is to be suppressed. Even if authority were reposed in either assemblage of league representatives to determine whether the obligation of article 10 had become active, and that it must be discharged by war against the offending State, there could be no valid objection to the covenant on constitutional grounds, for the various clauses through which such power would be granted would amount only to a covenant to make war whenever the league should determine as a fact that through external aggression the territorial integrity or political independence of a member was threatened. In any case there is no delegation of authority to the league to declare war or to make any order or proclamation as a result of which a state of war with all its consequences, like the suspension of all commercial intercourse, with which we have become familiar, immediately follows. A declaration of war by Congress is indispensable to put this country in a state of war unless actually attacked. The league covenant is a treaty by which our country binds itself at most to take the necessary steps to engage in war when the league determines that the occasion has arisen when, under the treaty, it should do so. This was recognized by the junior Senator from Washington in that part of one of his forceful addresses in which he assailed the league as being violative of the Constitution. But he asserted the action of Congress in such case would be perfunctory, there would be no escape from the obligation of the treaty "but in repudiation and dishonor." He is quite right. When by the treaty with France our country agreed to pay $15,000,000 for Louisiana, Congress was called upon perfunctorily to make the necessary appropriation. It could not in honor canvass the wisdom or the unwisdom of the purchase. The treaty obligated us to enact the necessary legislation. There was no escape from that obligation but in repudiation and dishonor. Similarly when by treaty we acquired Florida, Congress was called upon perfunctorily to make the necessary appropriation. And so with each successive acquisition of territory by treaty involving the payment of money—the purchase of Alaska and the Philippines, by way of illustration.

The Senator is right that there would be no escape from the obligation of the treaty but in repudiation and dishonor. But if he is correct in the view for which he contends, that the whole plan is violative of the Constitution, or is so violative in the particular feature involved in any transaction, there would be neither repudiation nor dishonor in declining to observe its terms. There is neither dishonor nor discredit in a man's declining to pay a promissory note executed in his name by one who never was authorized by him to make such an instrument.

It was in the course of the same address, as my memory serves me, that a colloquy ensued between the Senator named and the junior Senator from Nebraska, as a result of which a gross wrong was done the latter by a journalist whose comments on the league betray no studied effort impartially to present what may be said for or against it.

The Senator from Washington was pursuing the argument that a superstate was being erected in the league, to which vast powers were being delegated, among others to make war and peace and to prescribe what armament and military establishment the various nations shall maintain. In this connection the Senator from Nebraska remarked, "But it is only a treaty," clearly meaning, as he must have been understood by all who heard him, that there was no "supersovereignty" created by the covenant, but that our country had simply obligated itself thereby, quite as it had repeatedly done by other treaties, to make war in certain contingencies, to reduce its military forces, as provided therein, and to observe the other stipulations of the compact. This remark was interpreted as a flippant suggestion that we might wisely enter the league and then disregard its obligations when the day of trial came, as interest or inclination might prompt.

But the Senator was not more grossly misrepresented, as indicated, than has been the covenant being considered by not a few who have professed to enlighten the public concerning its terms and their significance. One of the members of this body has not scrupled to assert through the public press that if Ireland should rise in rebellion against Great Britain it would be the duty of the United States to aid in suppressing the insurrection.

FURTHER GROUNDS OF ATTACK CONSIDERED.

The reference just made to the question of the limitation of armaments prompts a further word on that subject. It would be gathered from much that has been said upon this subject that the league was to assume control of the whole subject, increasing or authorizing an increase in the case of any nation at will, reducing or prescribing a reduction at its pleasure. Before attempting to consider how grievously the Constitution is disregarded in this particular it will be well to have in mind what authority is conferred.

The league is authorized to propose a plan for the reduction of armaments, which becomes operative when approved by the nations affected. They all agree, assuming all approve the plan, to reduce accordingly. This is the voluntary act of each Government. Then each agrees not to increase so as to exceed the limit agreed upon without the permission of the league; that is, beyond a further limit to be fixed by the council. The only reason urged against the constitutionality of these provisions is that as Congress is given power to "raise and support armies and to provide and maintain a navy" the stipulation is an invasion of the exclusive power of Congress. But if it has not been demonstrated beyond cavil or controversy that it is no valid objection to a treaty that it deals with a subject as to which Congress is given power to legislate this feeble effort has been all in vain.

Some suggestion has been made to the effect that the mandatory provisions run counter to the Constitution, but in what particular is left vague. There is no longer any doubt of the right of our Government to acquire new territory and to govern it. If we can exercise complete sovereignty over new lands for all time, it will be difficult to establish that we can not exercise a limited sovereignty for a limited time. Then it is offered that article 20, by which each signatory stipulates that it will not enter into a treaty inconsistent with the covenant, is void, because otherwise the treaty-making power would be limited. That condition arises in the case of every treaty made with two or more powers. In the case of every such treaty no new compact could be made with either or any of the other signatory powers inconsistent with the general treaty, without violating it as to the party not participating in the later treaty. In effect the contention is that the United States may not enter into a treaty with two or more States.

Finally, referring to the dictum of Mr. Justice Field, quoted above, to the effect that the treaty-making power is not so extensive as to justify a treaty which makes a change in the character of the Government, it is urged that by reason of the large powers with which the league is invested the United States is transformed from an independent Nation into a constituent subject member of a "supersovereignty" or "superstate." This is mere declamation. It may be said in passing that this particular limitation, pointed out by the learned justice, does not arise by reason of any peculiarity of the Constitution of this country. Such a limitation is implied in the case of the representatives of every nation to whom is intrusted the treaty-making power. Clemenceau could no more, through a treaty with some other power, transform France from a Republic into a monarchy than Wilson and the Senate could accomplish a like result as to the United States.

What are these "vast powers" that are conferred upon the league? I shall omit those which are arbitral in character, assuming that no one in this day will assert that the United States may not, consistently with the Constitution, enter into treaties of arbitration, or that, in setting up a tribunal of arbitration, it surrenders any part of its sovereignty, or that it is in any sense violative of the Constitution to agree, on its part, faithfully to carry out the judgment and order of the arbitrator or arbitrators in the matter submitted.

By article 4 it is provided:

> The council may deal at its meetings with any matter within the sphere of action or affecting the peace of the world.

But it is given no power to do anything. Obviously this clause merely charges the league with the duty of considering, advising, and recommending. To a certainty, our Government has not bound itself by that clause to do anything, as it has, for instance, by article 10. That clause is clearly intended to make the league a forum in which the representatives of the various powers would be brought together to adjust differences that might result in war.

By article 8 the league is authorized to formulate plans for a reduction of armaments, the only power given to it, as heretofore pointed out, being to grant to any country after the plan has been adopted, authority to exceed the limit thereby fixed, a unanimous vote being required for the authorization.

By article 10 the league, through the council, "shall advise upon the means by which the obligation" into which the members enter shall fulfill the obligation thereby undertaken, namely, "to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and political independence of all members of the league."

Article 11 provides:

> Any war or threat of war, whether immediately affecting any of the members of the league or not, is hereby declared a matter of concern to the whole league, and the league shall take any action that may be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace of nations.

But what action can it take other than to endeavor to compose, to advise, or recommend? The league has no army to make war; it has no treasury to meet the expenses of war. It can not initiate a blockade, nor even lay an embargo. No nation has bound itself by any provision of the covenant to observe any directions that may be given it in the premises by the league or to follow any recommendations it may make. The same article provides:

> It is also declared to be the fundamental right of each member of the league to bring to the attention of the assembly or of the council any circumstance whatever affecting international relations which threaten to disturb either the peace or the good understanding between nations upon which peace depends.

The observations made apply equally to these provisions.

By article 13 the members agree to submit international controversies to arbitration. "In the event of failure" on the part of any nation which has thus submitted a controversy in which it is interested to carry out the award made, "the council shall propose what steps should be taken to give effect thereto." As no nation has ever declined or omitted to comply with an award, this duty is not likely to be burdensome, but all the league can do in the premises is to "propose" the steps to be taken in order to give effect to the award. The very term used implies that the nations affected may or may not take the steps proposed. None of them agree to do so or to take any steps at all.

Article 14 authorizes the league to set up a permanent court of international justice, which may or may not be resorted to by any of the powers, and which may be called upon for an opinion by the league.

By article 16 the council is authorized to recommend to the several Governments concerned what effective military or naval forces the members of the league shall severally contribute to the armaments of forces to protect the covenants of the league should any member make war in disregard thereof. It may do likewise under article 17 should a nonmember resort to war against a member, the latter declining to accept special membership in the league for the consideration of the controversy, or, having done so, making war in violation of the covenant.

By article 22 the league assumes a supervisory control over new governments brought into being by the treaty and over the German colonies and other regions similarly situated, incapable of governing themselves, and undertakes to govern them, respectively, through members willing to undertake the task.

If full governmental authority may be exercised for all time over newly acquired territory consistently with the Constitution, how can it be doubted that a limited authority may be exercised for a limited time over regions not now a part of our possessions.

Article 23 speaks for itself, as follows:

> ART. 23. Subject to and in accordance with the provisions of international conventions existing or hereafter to be agreed upon, the members of the league (a) will endeavor to secure and maintain fair and humane conditions of labor for men, women, and children both in their own countries and in all countries to which their commercial and industrial relations extend, and for that purpose will establish and maintain the necessary international organizations; (b) undertake to secure just treatment of the native inhabitants of territories under their control; (c) will intrust the league with the general supervision over the execution of agreements with regard to the traffic in women and children and the traffic in opium and other dangerous drugs; (d) will intrust the league with the general supervision of the trade in arms and ammunitions with the countries in which the control of this traffic is necessary in the common interest; (e) will make provision to secure and maintain freedom of communication and of transit and equitable treatment for the commerce of all members of the league. In this connection the special necessities of the regions devastated during the war of 1914–1918 shall be in mind; (f) will endeavor to take steps in matters of international concern for the prevention and control of disease.

It is idle to assert that an organization thus equipped is a government at all. It has no army and no treasury, and no means of securing either. It is not even invested with authority to appoint a commander in chief, should the nation members, in accordance with the terms of the covenant, take the field to force observance by a recalcitrant or to repel an attack made in violation of article 10. Though it may render decisions, it can not make laws, neither can it levy taxes. It deals with States as entities—not with individuals—negativing the idea that it is a government, according to Alexander Hamilton, who said, in urging the adoption of our Constitution:

> We must resolve to incorporate into our plan those ingredients which may be considered as forming the characteristic difference between a league and a government; we must extend the authority of the Union to the persons of our citizens—the only proper objects of government. (Federalist, No. 15.)

It may pass in this Chamber or on the hustings, but it is ventured that there is not a lawyer among us who would have the hardihood to contend before the Supreme Court of the United States, in a proceeding to enjoin the expenditure of public funds to pay the salaries of our league representatives, or in some other cause in which the question might properly be raised, that the covenant is void because, in the language of Justice Field, it effects "a change in the character of the Government." Incidentally it may be remarked that no treaty has ever been held by the Supreme Court to be violative of the Constitution, either in whole or in part.

TO AMEND THE TREATY IS TO REJECT IT.

Mr. President, I have undertaken to deal with one specific objection to the covenant of nations to secure the future peace of the world, not to canvass its general merits—a task that has been fully discharged by able Senators and other publicists. No one contends that it is perfect. Aside from the frailties that inhere in every work of man, it is to be remembered that any document which is to form the basis of such a league as is contemplated must meet the varying views or at least have the acquiescence of the representatives of more than a dozen nations and be sufficiently inviting to 40 or more, despite any burdens it may impose or disadvantages it may entail, to induce them to join. It may be that wiser statesmen, had they been delegated to represent us at Versailles, might have worked out in more perfect detail the general idea of the league to which the people of the United States have given overwhelming evidence that they are devoted. Their skill has not been put to the test. It may be that they, or others associated with them, could command, through superior talents and more adroit diplomacy, the unanimous assent of the representatives of the allied and neutral powers to the more perfect draft of a covenant thus prepared.

That is pure speculation. In all probability any draft, the product exclusively of the representatives of any one nation, would undergo modifications not altogether to the liking of its authors before it would be accepted with unanimity by the other parties to the treaty. But the people of the United States decreed in the manner prescribed in the Constitution that President Wilson and others of his choice should conduct the negotiations on our part. They have done so and we must accept their work or we must reject it. It is mere subterfuge to talk of amending the treaty of which the covenant forms an integral part. A vote to amend is a vote to reject. It is a plain misuse of language to assert that the Senate has any power to amend, however expressions long employed may tend to excite a contrary belief. The treaty can be amended only in the manner provided therein or by the concurrent action of all the parties signatory to it. What the Senate may do is to propose amendments, which in substance is a rejection of the treaty with a condition that it may stand as ratified provided all the other parties assent to the amendments proposed. The whole subject is thus opened up and negotiation must be resumed. Doubtless other nations dissatisfied with particular portions of the treaty would, in that event, propose amendments or will assent to the amendments proposed by us only on condition that certain changes in which they are interested be made.

The threatening discord about the territory on the eastern shore of the Adriatic breaks out once more; the Saar Basin again becomes a subject of controversy; Japan insists again on recognition of racial equality. The stupendous labors of the past six months are all undone, the delegates must reassemble to resume, like Sisyphus, the task they have just completed; peace is as far away as it was last November; business halts, unemployment becomes chronic, and some, at least, of the brave men who gloriously won the fight for us and are desperate to return to their homes and their business are perforce detained abroad to await eventualities, while the disorder necessarily attendant upon the present state of affairs in continental Europe develops into anarchy or chaos akin to it.

Some amelioration of conditions abroad, in the event that the Senate fails to ratify the treaty, may be expected should Germany sign and three of the leading powers associated with us approve it, since by its terms it will then become effective as between them. But that would only aggravate the deplorable state of affairs so far as American interests are concerned, because while our Allies would be at liberty to open up trade with Germany immediately, our products could seek that market only under the restrictions and embarrassments incident to a state of war relieved only by an armistice, if they could enter at all. American copper and American cotton, American wheat and American meat for German consumption would be marketed in England and resold to German houses.

This consideration may, perhaps, be entitled to little weight with those who regard the league as "treason," who are opposed to it fundamentally, but to those who indorse the general plan but object to the details only through which it is worked out it may properly be accorded attention. At least it may prompt a closer analysis of the reasoning on which their objections are founded to ascertain whether after all partisanship has not unduly magnified their importance, as it did those which were urged against the Jay treaty and the one which gave us the imperial domain of Louisiana.

The specious demand that the "covenant" be separated from the "treaty" and each be voted on separately is another way of expressing a desire to amend. Assuming a division possible, and it is not in view of many provisions of the treaty, a ratification of one and a rejection of the other would get us nowhere. The treaty is an entirety. No nation is bound by any part of it as to us unless we accept the whole.

The situation is not unlike that which was presented when our Constitution was submitted to the States for ratification. Its opponents, open and secret, were all strong for amending the draft submitted. Richard Henry Lee, whose brilliant talents and fiery zeal in the cause of independence all admired, was so strenuously opposed to the plan of "a more perfect union" that he declined to go as a delegate to the convention which framed the Constitution. He was insistent on "amending" it when it came before the several States for ratification, and making ratification conditional upon the acceptance of the proposed amendments. The same policy was generally followed by those in opposition. Elbridge Gerry, a delegate who declined to sign the completed draft, endeavored to have Massachusetts ratify only on condition that amendments were adopted. Washington was not deceived by this method of attack.

If another Federal convention is attempted—

So he wrote to Charles Carter, of Fredericksburg—its members will be more discordant; will agree upon no general plan. The Constitution is the best that can be obtained at this time; it is free from many of the imperfections with which it is charged. The Constitution or disunion is before us to choose from. If the Constitution is our election, a constitutional door is open for amendments and may be adopted in a peaceable manner without tumult or disorder.

In contrast with this course was that taken by Hamilton. The Constitution which was evolved through the labors of the convention conformed very feebly, as is well known, to his ideal.

In an effort to persuade several hesitating members to sign the completed draft, he said that no man's ideas were more remote from the plan than his own were known to be.

Scant consideration was given to the plan he submitted. For brevity I quote from Bancroft's terse summary of it:

The assembly, which was to be the corner stone of the edifice, was to consist of persons elected directly by the people for three years. It was to be checked by a senate elected by electors chosen by the people and holding office during good behavior. The supreme executive, whose term of office was to be good behavior, was to be elected by electors, chosen by electors chosen by the people. "It may be said"—these were his words—"this constitutes an elective monarchy; but by making the executive subject to impeachment the term 'monarchy' can not apply." The courts of the United States were so instituted as to place the General Government above the State governments in all matters of general concern. To prevent the States from passing laws contrary to the Constitution or laws of the United States, the executive of each State was to be appointed by the General Government, with a negative on all State legislation. (2 Bancroft, p. 44.)

And yet he became the ablest exponent as well as the most convincing advocate of the Constitution in the actual preparation of which, for one reason or another, he had had little part. It is but a just tribute to say, without disparagement of the loyal work of others, that but for his assistance the Constitution never would have been adopted. I have not been a follower of his school of political thought, but am able to understand the admiration in which he is held by those more ready to accept the principles which governed him in his political conduct. Some of them might profitably, in this crisis in the affairs of the Nation, emulate him in the unselfishness and patriotism he displayed in the rôle he played as defender of the Constitution.

Another example from the same period commands our reverent attention.

When the work of the convention was completed and the immortal document it produced was ready for the signature of the delegates, Benjamin Franklin, then a feeble old man past 80, too frail in body to make himself heard, but with a ripened wisdom that distinguished him among his fellows, even in his youth, asked Mr. Wilson to read the following address to his associate delegates:

I confess that there are several parts of this Constitution which I do not at present approve, but I am not sure I shall ever approve them: For having lived long, I have experienced many instances of being obliged by better information or fuller consideration, to change opinions even on important subjects, which I once thought right, but found to be otherwise. It is therefore that the older I grow, the more apt I am to doubt my own judgment and to pay more respect to the judgment of others.

I doubt too whether any other convention we can obtain may be able to make a better constitution. For when you assemble a number of men to have the advantage of their joint wisdom, you inevitably assemble with those men all their prejudices, their passions, their errors of opinion, their local interests, and their selfish views. From such an assembly can a perfect production be expected? It therefore astonishes me, sir, to find this system approaching so near to perfection as it does, and I think it will astonish our enemies who are waiting with confidence to hear that our councils are confounded like those of the builders of Babel, and that our States are on the point of separation, only to meet hereafter for the purpose of cutting one another's throats. Thus I consent, sir, to this constitution because I expect no better, and because I am not sure that it is not the best. The opinions I have had of its errors I sacrifice to the public good. I have never whispered a syllable of them abroad. Within these walls they were born, and here they shall die. If every one of us in returning to our constituents were to report the objections he has had to it and endeavor to gain partisans in support of them, we might prevent its being generally received and thereby lose all the salutary effects and great advantages resulting naturally in our favor among foreign nations as well as among ourselves from our real or apparent unanimity * * *.

On the whole, sir, I can not help expressing a wish that every member of the convention who may still have objections to it would with me on this occasion doubt a little of its own infallibility, and to make manifest our unanimity, put his name to this instrument.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3478) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, asks conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. GOOD, Mr. CANNON, and Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution authorizing the Clerk of the House in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 2480) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, to strike out the word "and" in line 14, page 66, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I notice from the press reports that the stockholders of the International Mercantile Marine Co. will hold a meeting on Monday, the 16th of June, for the purpose of approving or disapproving of the sale to a British syndicate of the Marine Co.'s British-owned ships. I was glad to see that the American International Corporation, which I understand is the largest stockholder in the International Mercantile Marine, intended at the meeting to vote its stock against the proposed sale, that a meeting of the board of directors of the American International Corporation was held on Thursday, the 5th, for the purpose of taking action with reference thereto, and that at the meeting the directors directed that the stock be voted against the proposed sale and among other reasons for their action gave the following:

The principal considerations which influenced the board in taking this action were, first, the corporation has made its considerable investments in the common and preferred stocks of the International Mercantile Marine Co. in pursuance of its definite purpose to aid in maintaining and increasing transportation of American merchandise in American-owned ships; that the fleet is one of the best in the world to-day; that the decrease in American-controlled tonnage would come at a time of maximum demand for shipping facilities at profitable rates; and that the sale of the British ships and assets would almost unavoidably lead to the liquidation of the American company as a going concern. This would mean the giving up of terminal facilities, dock leases, and the closing of agencies, etc., throughout the world—all these representing a business good will and assets established in the course of many years, and being of great, in some cases of irreplaceable, value.

I am very much gratified to note that the American International Corporation is taking this laudable stand. It seems to me that no greater discouragement could come to this country in its efforts to build up a merchant marine at the present time than for this sale to be made. One of the greatest questions confronting the American people to-day is the establishment of an American merchant marine. This being the case, how suicidal it would be for the greatest shipping company in this country, and probably in the world, to dispose of approximately 703,000 tons of magnificent shipping to foreign interests. Of what avail is it to people who are interested in building up an American merchant marine to bend their efforts toward establishing a policy of this Government whereby we can have such a merchant marine as we need if the greatest men who are now engaged in that business dispose of 703,000 tons of ships at one time. It naturally would mean the disintegration of the company and a damper upon the enthusiasm of men who want to go into the shipping business, and will lead the ordinary man to think that those who are now in the business and who supposedly have the best knowledge of what the future of it will be have no confidence that an American merchant marine can be built up. Therefore, having been interested in this question for years and doing what I could to see that this country has a merchant marine second to none, I earnestly hope that the stockholders will emphatically disapprove of this proposed sale, and that the magnificent fleet will still be continued to be owned by an American company.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I desire to say that I heartily indorse the views just expressed by the senior Senator from Florida. In my judgment it would be a national calamity for the sale of those ships as proposed to take place.

Mr. JONES of Washington subsequently said:

Mr. President, I understand that a few moments ago the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] presented a statement with reference to the proposed sale of ships owned by American interests but now under the British flag. I had previously seen that statement, it having been inserted in the RECORD. I heartily indorse it. I concur in the sentiments and opinions expressed therein. I regretted very much to see those ships go under a foreign flag, and I hope that our people will see their way clear to hold the interest which they have in those ships.

PRINTING OF PEACE TREATY.

Mr. BORAH. I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a Senate document the proposed peace treaty which was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATSON in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. FLETCHER. There is some requirement with reference to the printing of a document which I think ought to be observed, and that is that there must be an estimate of the cost. For that reason I think it ought to be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BORAH. I ask, then, that it be printed and that the request be referred to the Committee on Printing. Is that all right?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BORAH. May I suggest to the Committee on Printing that if it is printed it be printed in a little larger type than the ordinary type?

Mr. SMOOT. May I also call the Senator's attention to the fact that there are maps accompanying it and that he includes them in his request?

Mr. BORAH. I include the maps.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Chair hears none.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 641) to amend section 10 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask that the bill be read and that the amendments of the Committee on Interstate Commerce be considered as they are reached.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. McKELLAR. Before the reading of the bill begins I ask the Senator from Iowa if he will yield to me long enough to read into the RECORD a short resolution?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no objection.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is a resolution adopted by the General Federation of Women's Club in biennial session at Asheville, N. C., May 29, 1919:

Whereas the covenant of the league of nations is presented to the United States for popular action; and

Whereas the General Federation of Women's Clubs, now assembled in biennial session, representing the interests of 2,000,000 women and exerting the influence they may exercise in their communities:

Resolved, That the council send its approval of the revised covenant of the league of nations to members of the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate, the President of the United States, now in France; and

Resolved, That the members of the State federations ask their Senators to vote in support of the league of nations.

Mr. BORAH. I ask leave, out of order, to present a resolution by the Friends of Irish Freedom of Central Ohio. I desire to have it printed in the RECORD following the resolution read by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR].

Mr. McKELLAR. May I ask what organization it is?

Mr. BORAH. It is an organization of the Friends of Irish Freedom of Central Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The resolution referred to is as follows:

Resolved by the Friends of Irish Freedom of Central Ohio, assembled at Columbus, Ohio, this Easter Sunday evening, A. D. 1919, That it is the sense of this meeting that Ireland, in conjunction with other small nationalities, is entitled to the right of self-determination, and that she of right ought to be a free and independent nation. We respectfully but earnestly request the President of the United States to urge the peace conference to recognize the republican government now existing in Ireland; be it further

Resolved, That we are opposed to the adoption of any covenant for a league of nations which will trespass upon the rights of American sovereignty or permit foreign nations to determine the course of action of the United States whenever any question of the protection of American rights be involved. We believe that the American people will determine every question justly, and we oppose any diminution of the supreme power of the United States to determine its own course of action.

Resolved further, That we are in favor of the maintenance of the Monroe doctrine in all of its vigor, and we believe in the soundness of the advice of Washington, Jefferson, Adams, Madison, and Monroe, that it is to the best interest of this country to avoid entangling alliances with any foreign nation.

Resolved further, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to Hon. Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, and to the United States Senate; and be it further Resolved, That a cablegram of greeting and best wishes be forwarded to the Irish-American envoys, Messrs. Walsh, Dunne, and Ryan, now awaiting a hearing at the peace conference at Paris.

JOHN A. CONNOR, Chairman.
L. A. JORDAN, Secretary.
TIMOTHY S. HOGAN,
Chairman Committee on Resolutions.

THIRD DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN in the chair) laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3478) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. CURTIS, and Mr. UNDERWOOD conferees on the part of the Senate.

INDIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, which was read:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 2480) entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920," the Clerk be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to strike out the word "and" in line 14 of page 66 of said bill.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate concur in the resolution of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. KING. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATSON in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Henderson	Norris	Smoot
Culberson	Hitchcock	Nugent	Spencer

Fernald	King	Poindexter	Walsh, Mass.
Frelinghuysen	Kirby	Pomerene	Warren

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-two Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. NEW, Mr. SIMMONS, and Mr. SWANSON answered to their names when called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 641) to amend section 10 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Interstate Commerce was, on page 3, line 6, after the word "right," to insert "as to interstate commerce"; in line 8, after the word "upon," to strike out "it" and to insert "said right"; in line 14, after the word "regulations," to insert "directly affecting interstate commerce"; and in line 23, before the words "Director General of Railroads," to insert "President or the," so as to read:

That during the period of Federal control the right to initiate or change rates, fares, charges, classifications, regulations, and practices exercised by the carriers now under Federal control, prior to the 29th day of December, 1917, shall hereafter be exercised by the President, or by the Director General of Railroads, but such right as to interstate commerce shall be exercised under all the limitations and conditions which were imposed upon said right by the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, as amended; and the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have as full and complete authority and jurisdiction to set aside, change, modify, suspend, or otherwise review all such rates, fares, charges, classifications, and regulations directly affecting interstate commerce as though the Government had not assumed the possession and control of said transportation systems. To that end the said act to regulate commerce, as amended, is hereby declared to be in full force and effect with respect to rates, fares, charges, classifications, practices, and regulations, anything in the act approved March 21, 1918, to the contrary notwithstanding. The procedure before the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be the same as formerly, except that the President or the Director General of Railroads shall stand in the stead of the carriers, and all notices theretofore required to be given to or served upon carriers shall be given to or served on said Director General. All orders or findings of the commission shall bind the Director General to the same extent as they formerly bound the carriers.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 6, after the word "regulations," to insert "directly affecting interstate commerce," so as to make the clause read:

In determining any question concerning any such rates, fares, charges, classifications, practices, or regulations, directly affecting interstate commerce, or any changes or proposed changes in the same, the reasonableness thereof or any discrimination therein, the rule to be applied shall be the same as existed under the said act to regulate commerce, as amended, and under the general law of the subject as it was prior to the Government's possession and control.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 12, to insert:

In computing the time allowed in the present law for presenting claims to the Interstate Commerce Commission for reparation, the period of Federal control preceding the passage and approval of this act shall be excluded, and, likewise, in computing the time for presenting claims or bringing suits for loss or damage arising out of the transportation of persons or property, the period of Federal control prior to the passage and approval of this act shall be excluded.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am very glad that this legislation has been begun. I hope that the office of the Director General of Railroads will soon be divested of all control over interstate rate making.

I referred yesterday very briefly to some of the exorbitant and inequitable increases in freight charges. I have never been able myself to understand why it should be published to the world that there was but a 25 per cent increase in freight rates, when, as a matter of fact, by reason of certain changes in the classifications, those rates went as high as from 50 to 60 per cent when it came to the shipment of coarse grain; to 240 per cent when it came to the shipment of tea from New Orleans; and, as one of the Senators before the committee said, he had information from his own section of the country that increases were made as high as 500 per cent.

The hearings which we had before the committee, and which covered a number of weeks during the last session, convinced me that the Director General and his staff were very much more interested in making orders that would suit their convenience than to suit the convenience of the shippers themselves.

I want to call two or three instances to the attention of the Senate, in order that the public may perhaps better understand what has been done. The Railroad Administration sought by different orders to change the rule of liability; they sought to change the place where suits should be begun; and they denied the right of certain claimants against railroad employees to begin garnishee proceedings. I want merely to take the time of the Senate for a few moments to refer to two or three of these matters.

Lawyers all know that under the rule of bailments a common carrier is supposed to furnish a car that is fit for the purpose for which it is intended to be used. It does not take a lawyer to understand that should be the rule, common sense suggests it, and yet they issued the famous general order No. 57 with relation to the shipment of grain. They provide in that order that the shipper himself must inspect the car to ascertain whether or not it is in a condition such as to preserve the cargo. I want to read just a paragraph from this rule. Under paragraph 2 of the rule they say:

While carriers are expected to furnish suitable equipment, it is the duty of the shipper to reject a car which is unfit for the loading intended.

Shippers should not load bulk grain in a car with door post shattered or broken, or with other defects of such character as to render car obviously unfit, or with inside showing the presence of oil, creosote, fertilizer, manure, coal, or other damaging substances of like or kindred character.

Under this rule the Director General's office proposed that if a shipper should use a car which had previously been loaded with some such substances, then he would not be able to collect if he sustained any damage. If the car leaks on its journey to its destination and a large part of the cargo is lost, if the car had not been inspected by the shipper, he is to be chargeable with the fact that he did not have a proper car and his right of recovery defeated. I do not think that the Attorney General's office had any authority under the railroad-control act to adopt a rule of that kind, but nevertheless they did it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. SHEPPARD. May I suggest to the Senator that this bill does not interfere with the continued operation of that rule as to shipments wholly within a State?

Mr. POMERENE. I realize that very fully, and referred to that fact yesterday to some extent. I hope we will get to a point later on, when it comes to shipments within a State, that the local authorities will have a proper control of that intrastate commerce; but that is another question.

I wish to call attention to another proposition. In my State, and I dare say in nearly all other States of the Union, there are certain statutes, local in character, which permit the creditor of an employee by garnishee proceedings to tie up 10 per cent of the funds of an employee in the event that a debt has been incurred for necessaries, such as food supplies or clothing or rent.

That has been the rule in my State for probably 15 or 20 years; but the Director General's office issued an order to the effect that no suit shall be brought against a railroad company and thereby tie up its funds. Is there any justification for that? They excuse themselves for making this order by reason of the fact that under some provision of the railroad-control act the earnings of the company are regarded as public funds and therefore they should not be garnisheed, ignoring entirely the rights of creditors in the various States.

Whether the Director General has this power or not I will not take the time to discuss, but I am sure his course has been very bad policy.

Let me call attention to another of their rules. Under the Carmack law, which was later amended and supplemented very materially by a bill introduced by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], now the able chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, it was provided that bills of lading should be so framed as to make the company issuing them responsible in damages for losses occurring on another line between the point of shipment and point of destination, and suits might be brought against the initial carrier, and, if damage accrued to the cargo, that all the shipper would have to do would be to prove the fact that there had been a loss, and it would make no difference whether it was on the lines of the initial carrier or on those of some intervening carrier. The Railroad Director General's office changed that rule so as to provide that a suit shall only be begun against the initial carrier in the event that the shipper resides in the county or district in which the shipment originated at the time he begins the suit, or that he shall go to the place where the loss occurred; in other words, if there were a shipment of grain from Minneapolis to Baltimore via Pittsburgh by one who did not live in that district or county, or if he lived there at the time of the shipment but later moved away, he could not begin the suit in Minneapolis; but if the loss should occur at Pittsburgh on its way to Baltimore, then the shipper would have to go to Pittsburgh, if that was on another line, in order to begin his suit.

It is just such rules as these that have offended the shipping public of the country, and I am glad that the President has seen fit to say that the railroads shall go back to their owners not later than January 1. I hope that the Congress will be able to pass some of the remedial legislation which is believed to be necessary before that time, so that the railroads can be returned to private control at an earlier date.

I now wish to call attention to another matter. When I say this I recognize the fact that the former Secretary of the Treasury did a most wonderful work as Secretary of the Treasury. I think he made the greatest Secretary of the Treasury that we have had for 50 years. I wish I could say as much about the management of the railroads, whether by him or by the present director general. Some reference was made by the distinguished chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee yesterday concerning the finances of the railroads, and I agree with him that, considering the railroad question from that standpoint, the problem is a most serious one. One of the reasons which was urged for a continuance of Government control of the railroads was the introduction of certain economies; and among these economies was the taking away of the large salaries of some of the railroad executives and their counsel.

It was claimed that during the first year they had saved something like $6,100,000 by cutting out high salaries. We were not furnished at that time with a statement as to the cost of the director general's office, and we have not a complete statement of it yet; but we have had a few figures which furnish a side light on the question. Early in January the committee asked for a statement of these expenditures and for a list of the employees. It did not come until a communication was received by the chairman of the committee dated March 1. It did not contain the names of the officials. I did not see it until 2 o'clock on Tuesday morning, March 4, but it contains some little interesting information. While one of the complaints made against private ownership was the large salaries paid under private control, it would seem from an investigation of this document that there is not very much difference between the cost of Government control and private control. I am only going to refer to some of the larger salaries.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. KING. I may not have apprehended the meaning of the statement just made by the Senator. Does he mean to state that it cost as much to operate the railroads when they were under the control of the owners and before the Government took control of them as it has cost to operate them since the Government assumed control of the railroad systems of the country?

Mr. POMERENE. No, Mr. President, I did not mean to say that. I have not sufficient information on that question to discuss the comparative cost of the two managements. What I was calling attention to was simply the fact that there was not any material difference in the salaries which were paid under private control and those paid under Government control.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, I think when the full facts are disclosed it will be shown that there are more employees now than there were before for the performance of the same tasks——

Mr. POMERENE. I think that is true.

Mr. KING. And that the cost of the personnel employed in the operation of the railroads under Government operation is very greatly in excess of the cost of the railroads when in the hands of their owners.

Mr. POMERENE. The statement was made the other day before the committee—and I have no reason to doubt it—that there were about 141,000 more employees now than there were a year or 18 months ago.

But to revert to the question of official salaries, there are 5 men or officials on the Director General's staff each of whom gets $50,000. There are 2 each getting $40,000. There are 3 each getting $35,000. There are 2 getting $30,000 each, 8 receiving $25,000 each, 11 receiving $20,000 each, 1 receiving $18,500, 1 receiving $18,000, 1 receiving $17,500, 6 receiving $15,000 each, 1 receiving $14,000, 1 receiving $13,200, 1 receiving $12,500, 4 receiving $12,000 each, 1 receiving $10,800, 1 receiving $10,600, and 23 receiving $10,000 each; or a total of 72 men on the staff of the Director General receiving salaries aggregating $1,398,100, or an average of $19,418.

I think that when they attempt to show the economies, particularly in the reduction of the salaries of the executives of the railroads under private management, they at least ought to have been fair to the committee and fair to the public in giving a statement as to what salaries they were paying, so that we would be able to compare them.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. Has the Senator been unable to obtain a list of the employees under private management, and the salaries they were paid?

Mr. POMERENE. No; I do not have them, but there was a good deal of complaint made because there were salaries of $50,000, $40,000, and so forth. There were some few salaries, I think—at least, I have been so told—that were somewhat in excess of these figures; but, after all, the salaries which are being paid are about the same—I am speaking, of course, in general terms—whether under public management or private management.

It seems to me, however, just a little bit strange that we have a great Chief Justice of the United States on the comparatively small salary of $15,000, yet when it comes to a railroad management we have to have men receiving salaries in the amounts I have indicated. Think of it. Each one of a number of these railroad officials receive more salary than the great Chief Justice and two Justices of our great Supreme Court.

I had intended to go more at length into some of these abuses, and I may do so at some future time, but I felt it not inappropriate at the present time to lay a few of these facts before the Senate. It is just such facts as these, among other reasons which might be urged, that have persuaded me that there is a great necessity for the termination of Government control at the earliest practicable moment, taking into consideration the financial situation.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I would like to ask the author of the amendment a question. The purpose of the bill, as I understand, is to put the power to initiate rates by the President and the Director General under the old condition.

Mr. CUMMINS. That was done in the act of March, 1918.

Mr. KIRBY. Yes; and the rates then were subject to review before they were put into operation, for reasonableness?

Mr. CUMMINS. No. In the act of March, 1918, known as the railway-control act, the right to initiate, change, and modify rates was given to the President of the United States, just as it had been formerly exercised by the several carrier companies. Formerly, however, the Interstate Commerce Commission had the right to suspend and revise those rates before they were put into force, and that right was taken away from the Interstate Commerce Commission in the act of 1918.

Mr. KIRBY. Is it the purpose of this bill to restore that function?

Mr. CUMMINS. It is.

Mr. KIRBY. That is what I understood.

Mr. President, I shall support the amendment; and, so far as the Government control of the railroads is concerned, it does not seem to have been a complete success. It certainly has not been from the financial or money-making standpoint. There have been many reasons, it seems to me, why it has not been successful; and I am not prepared to say that it was due to mismanagement or to lack of efficient management or to lack of employment of talent that ought to have been capable of managing them successfully. The great trouble about the whole matter has been that there was no incentive upon the part of the directors in direct charge of the railroads to manage them successfully and economically, because the Government stood behind them all, and there could not be a loss to the private ownership. The returns and profits were guaranteed.

That has been the great trouble about it all. I understand that the wages have been increased practically—if the increase had extended over a period of a year—$800,000,000 a year. We know that the rates have been increased, and the service has not been improved, but rather has been impaired. It has not been as efficient, to say the least, under war-time management in the delivery of freight, the service to the public as it had been before. I attribute that, however, rather to the conditions that made the war-time control necessary; but I hope it will soon be that we may get down to a condition where the railroads will exist to subserve the public interest and convenience, where they shall have a reasonable amount of compensation for the service they render; and that is all they are entitled to as public-service corporations. The best method for bringing that about is still to be determined by the Congress of the United States. They are in the control of the Government now, and it does not yet appear when they will be released; but before they are released, if it shall become necessary that these roads be returned to private ownership, it is my opinion not only that the Government should retain, through some agency, the power to fix and control and revise the reasonableness of rates, but somewhere and somehow the same agency should have the power to determine the reasonableness of wages to be paid to the employees engaged in this activity. That much control should be retained in some agency of the Government if it becomes necessary to restore the roads to private ownership.

Mr. CUMMINS. So far as the bill that is now before the Senate is concerned, those rights are retained by the President fully and completely. The Director General fixes the wages of all the men; and that he will continue to do so long as the roads are in Federal control.

Mr. KIRBY. I understand the conditions on that point as does the Senator from Iowa; but my opinion is that when the control by the Government is released, or the roads are put back into private ownership, the same agency that has the right to review for reasonableness the rates initiated, or the rates put into effect, ought also to have the power to determine the reasonableness of the wages to be paid the employees engaged in this activity.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from Arkansas is stating a conclusion which everybody will have to accept before very long.

Mr. KIRBY. I do not care to discuss the matter further, as it has not reached the point where we are determining what shall finally be done with the railroads.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat, I gather from what the Senator said that he did not understand that the Government has had the right heretofore, under the interstate-commerce clause, to determine the reasonableness of the rates.

Mr. KIRBY. Oh, no; there is no question about that at all. The question with me was whether this amendment was designed to do away with the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to test the reasonableness of these rates before they were put into effect. The question that I was discussing later on was that when the railroads shall be returned to private ownership, the same agency that controls the rates or revises the rates ought to have the power also to determine the reasonableness of the wages to be paid to people engaged in this activity.

Mr. KING. Without entering into a discussion of that power, does not the Senator think that if the Government should attempt to fix the wages of those who are working for the railroads that are engaged in interstate commerce, appeals would be made that the Government should take over the fixing of wages for every activity—private, corporate, or otherwise—first if the product was interstate and then finally if it was purely intrastate? Does not the Senator think that the moment the Government announced that policy—namely, that it would fix the wages of those employed upon railroads engaged in interstate commerce—appeals would be made that it should fix the wages of all persons whose products might be conceived or considered to be interstate in character?

Mr. KIRBY. I do not think it would necessarily go to any such extent as that; and I say that the function and the power to determine the reasonableness of wages as the reasonableness of rates is determined should also be left in Government control, without regard to when the railroads are turned back to private ownership.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think that in fixing the rates, in determining whether they are reasonable or not—I am speaking now of freight rates and passenger rates—incidentally, if not directly, the question of wages is involved?

Mr. KIRBY. Yes; it must all come into consideration, of course; but suppose these wages are not paid?

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think that with the organization of labor as it exists to-day, and the collective-bargaining system which prevails in this country, and against which no one can or ought to inveigh, there need be very much concern in respect to the power to fix wages?

Mr. KIRBY. Of course, if labor is able to take care of itself without inconvenience to the public or without destruction of the public rights, it might be well; but if it all could be arranged here as it is about the rates, and the employees protected in their wages, and some of the great strikes could be prevented and no injury done to the public, it seems to me it would be well to have the power retained to do that.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think—and I repeat the question which I propounded a few moments ago—that when you invest the Federal Government with the power to fix wages you are to some extent invading the rights and prerogatives of the individual, of the labor unions, of those who engage in labor; and does not the Senator think that if the Government attempted the fixing of wages for those who are engaged in railroad work, inevitably the demand would be made, either by the employers or by the employees or by the public, that it should fix wages in everything else, particularly if the product of the labor was interstate in character?

Mr. KIRBY. The Senator does not appear to get my meaning. I have not said that the Government should fix the wages of the people engaged in this activity, but that it should retain the power to determine the reasonableness of the wages to be paid to the people engaged in this activity in order to protect them.

Mr. KING. Well, after all, does not that mean the power to fix wages?

Mr. KIRBY. I do not think so. That is as far as I care to go.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa a question.

I have a letter from John Barton Payne, the attorney for the Railroad Administration, in which he calls my attention to the fact that this bill provides that—

All final judgments for a plaintiff or plaintiffs rendered in actions for personal injuries or for loss of or damage to property shall be promptly paid.

As it provides; and he then says:

There is no distinction here between judgments on causes of action arising during or prior to Federal control. Unfortunately there are several roads in the country in receiverships and insolvent. This is a mandate requiring the Government to pay all of the judgments against such roads. As a matter of fact, there has been no controversy about the payment of judgments except those arising prior to Federal control, as to which the Director General did not have the say; and the only matters in that connection which have come to my knowledge were brought to my attention by Congressman RAGSDALE, of South Carolina.

I was just wondering whether or not the Senator from Iowa would be willing to have an amendment inserted after the word "judgments," in line 10, page 2, so as to read, "All final judgments arising out of causes of action during Federal control"?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I think the bill as it is does not provide for payment of judgments except upon causes of action arising subsequent to Federal control; but the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana presents an inquiry that the Senate might very well make. Personally I believe that the railroads ought to pay the judgments that were rendered against them prior to Federal control, just as they pay the judgments rendered subsequent to Federal control. It will be seen that the bill is limited to judgments for personal injuries or for loss of or damage to property, and says that they shall be promptly paid by the Director General of Railroads. I did not intend to raise the question; but, now that it is presented, I hope the Senate will deal with it according to its view of the justice of the matter.

When we passed these railroads to the Government we took away from the citizens of the country who had recovered judgments for personal injuries the right to levy upon any of the property of the railroad companies and they had no relief whatever. It has always seemed to me to be rather unjust that these payments should be suspended in the air during the period of Federal control, when their damages should have been paid and the amount charged to operating expense. However, I must say that in drafting the bill I had in mind only the causes of action which arose after the Government took possession and began to operate the property; and if the Senator from Indiana desires to present an amendment of that character I shall not myself resist it.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, it occurs to me that that amendment should be incorporated in the bill. I can well understand the hardship that it worked upon those who had judgments against railroads before Government control; but, after all, since Government control there has been no money with which to pay those judgments, so Mr. Payne says, without doing an injustice to the Railroad Administration. If the railroad companies themselves would furnish the money with which to pay these judgments, there would be no trouble about it; but under existing circumstances it seems as if that can not be done. Therefore it appears that the only safe course to pursue is to incorporate this amendment and permit these judgments to remain suspended, so to speak, until after private ownership shall have been inaugurated.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Do I understand that claims for damages arising out of contracts have not been paid by the operating department?

Mr. WATSON. No.

Mr. KING. Or merely those which sound in tort?

Mr. WATSON. Those which sound in tort [reading]:

All final judgments for a plaintiff or plaintiffs rendered in actions for personal injuries or for loss of or damage to property shall be promptly paid by the Director General of Railroads.

Mr. KING. My understanding has been that actions growing out of injuries to property and damages to property which perhaps might be designated actions ex delicto instead of actions ex contractu have been met by the Railroad Administration and paid.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator is very much misinformed.

Mr. WATSON. Yes; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. CUMMINS. A vast number of these claims have neither been adjusted nor have they been paid after they were adjusted.

Mr. KING. Then, if that be true, perhaps there are valid obligations against the Railroad Administration or against the railroads aggregating millions and tens of millions of dollars which ultimately will have to be paid, and which ought to have been taken into account in determining the cost of governmental control and operation.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator, I am sure, will discover as time goes on, and when the accounts are complete, that there are a good many costs of operation that have not yet been disclosed.

Mr. KING. Then, if I may be pardoned——

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. KING. When the Senator stated that the Government was running behind in the neighborhood of about $2,000,000 a day, the Senator did not state that, but, as I understood him to state, perhaps, the loss would be six or seven hundred million dollars for the year——

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I stated that the Govenment had lost last year about $240,000,000, and that the first four months of this year indicated a loss of about $250,000,000, and if that rate were continued throughout the year we would have for the whole period of Federal control a loss of something like six or seven hundred million dollars.

Mr. KING. Accepting those figures, then, the loss would be very much greater if the railroads had paid these valid claims against them, growing out of the loss of property or injuries to individuals.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know the aggregate of the claims that have accumulated during this period. I only know that I have had a very great number of complaints with regard to claims which have not been paid nor even recognized in the way of adjustment.

Mr. WATSON. I will say to the Senator from Iowa, if he will permit the interruption, that Judge Payne told me over the telephone that they had paid a very great number of these claims, running into a very large amount. He told me that he would give me a memorandum of the payments, but I have not yet received it. I think it may cast some light on this subject.

Mr. CUMMINS. Undoubtedly that is true; but there are a great many of them which remain unpaid that have not yet been considered. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] read certain orders of the administration which attempted to change the rules of the law with regard to evidence or with regard to the liability of the carriers. We were informed in the committee that these claims had been at least delayed and had not been adjusted or paid. I do not want it to be understood that I am criticizing the Railroad Administration. I only state the fact that there is a very large number of claims that have not been paid, and there are judgments which have not been paid. One of the orders of the former Director General—not the present Director General—which was introduced in evidence declared, in so many words, that if the Director General was satisfied that the verdict of a jury or the judgment of a court was induced by prejudice or passion he would not recognize the verdict or judgment.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, my understanding is that the Railroad Administration is entirely willing to pay all judgments arising during Federal control as fast as they get the money. They do not want to undertake to pay these judgments that were secured against the railroad companies before Federal control, because they have not the money and because they want these judgments paid by the companies themselves after they shall have been restored to private management.

If the Senator from Iowa is entirely satisfied to have the amendment inserted, I shall be very pleased to offer it; otherwise I shall not, because I want him to be satisfied upon this point.

Mr. CUMMINS. I want the Senator from Indiana to pursue his own judgment about it. I will say to him, however, that, as the author of the bill, I did not intend to provide for the payment of judgments which were rendered prior to Federal control.

Mr. THOMAS. May I ask the Senator if the proposed amendment of the Senator from Indiana would not merely clarify that situation?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think so; but I am bound to say at the same time that I think it would be only just for the Government, out of the revenues of the companies, to pay these judgments which had been rendered prior to Federal control.

Mr. THOMAS. I think that is true, with the possible exception of those companies which are in the hands of receivers.

Mr. CUMMINS. That would be a very proper exception. I shall not resist the amendment if it is offered.

Mr. WATSON. Then I offer the amendment, Mr. President.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator read the amendment, if it is not very long?

Mr. WATSON. On page 2, in line 10, after the word "judgments," insert the words "on causes of action arising during Federal control."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question. In the event the Railroad Administration becomes dissatisfied under this measure with the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission in a rate controversy what recourse has it?

Mr. CUMMINS. The Railroad Administration would have the same recourse that the carriers had prior to Federal control.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Then we would have the spectacle of the Federal Government going into court bringing suit in the nature of an appeal from the decision of one of its own subordinate agencies.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely; that is one of the anomalies that is inseparable from the assumption on the part of the Federal Government of a business enterprise. I do not think that can be avoided.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Add as a new section at the end of the bill:

That nothing in this act or in any act heretofore passed by Congress shall absolve any railroad or other common carrier from obeying any rate, rule, regulation, or practice of any State with respect to the transportation of passengers or property, or the receiving, delivery, storage, or handling of property wholly within one State and not shipped to or from a foreign country, from or to any State or Territory as aforesaid, unless and until such common carrier shall have secured the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction holding such rate, rule, regulation, or practice imposed as aforesaid to be unreasonable.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, the pending bill restores the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission over interstate rates, but leaves the United States Railroad Administration in absolute and unqualified control of intrastate rates and shipments. It occurs to me that if the jurisdiction of any agency should be restored that of the States should be included. It seems to me that the United States Railroad Administration is in far better position to control and adjust the interstate rates and shipments than it is the multitude of rates and shipments wholly within the various States and relating to situations wholly local.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I am in entire sympathy with the intention and purpose of the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas. I think that matter should be corrected in this bill, but I am just a little afraid that the amendment he suggests will not have that effect. I suggest to him that after the word "systems," in line 16, page 3, the insertion of this language, which would probably correct the trouble, be made:

Provided, That the initiation and regulation of intrastate rates shall be restored to State control as provided prior to said act of March 21, 1918.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, the decisions prior to the date which the Senator mentions had practically given the Interstate Commerce Commission control to a large degree of intrastate rates. The Shreveport case was one notable instance. The railroad commissioners of various States held a national meeting and joined in a protest against the tendency to concentrate control over local and intrastate rates and shipments in a Federal body.

It is the object of this amendment not only to restore and define the jurisdiction of the State commissions during the pendency of Federal control but to counteract any decision that was made in that direction before the period of Federal control, and to operate permanently.

Mr. McKELLAR. In other words, the purpose of the Senator's amendment is to go further than restoring the status quo by the passage of the act of March 21, 1918, and to give the State commissions a little larger authority than they then exercised.

Mr. SHEPPARD. No; to give them authority over the intrastate rates and shipments which they possessed before the decision of the Supreme Court in the Shreveport case and similar cases.

Mr. McKELLAR. That would be an enlargement of their powers, of course.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It would be a preservation of their proper powers.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I have listened with interest to what the Senator has just said and what he states to be the purpose of his amendment. I should be very glad to vote for his amendment along certain lines, but if it goes as far as he states it goes I could not vote for it.

I am one of those in the Senate who opposed the taking away the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission when the original railroad act was passed. I did not at that time believe it was necessary, and I do not believe it has proven to be either wise or necessary at this time. I also believe that, as far as that is concerned, it would have been wise to have allowed the State railroad commissions to exercise their powers within their States. If the amendment were limited to the proposition of allowing them to exercise the powers which they had before December 31, 1917, when they took over the railroads, and the limitation of those powers as defined by the Supreme Court of the United States, I would have no objection to the amendment offered by the Senator.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Is the Senator familiar with the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the so-called Shreveport case?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am, and I am heartily in accord with it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. In that case the Supreme Court held that the Interstate Commerce Commission had a right to raise the rates between Dallas, Tex., and another Texas point, although the State railroad commission had fixed the rates after a careful investigation of all the equities concerned, and although the rates adopted were based on a proper return of revenue upon the capital invested.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am sure that is true, and that is the way I understand the case, and that is the reason why I object to the amendment offered by the Senator. If he will bear with me, I will give my reasons. They may not sound good to him, but they are convincing to me.

It takes a slight historic view of this situation to really understand the Shreveport case. We have to go back as far as the adoption of the commerce clause of the Constitution. The clause in the Federal Constitution that had more to do with the binding together of the States in one central government than any other clause in it was the commerce clause, and it grew out of the fact that we were having a commercial war between the States under the old federation, when one State could adopt its own tariff laws and its own regulations and one State was making war on another. At the port of Newport, R. I., they were attempting to adopt customs tariffs that required their neighbors in New Hampshire, Connecticut, and New York to pay the cost of running the government of Rhode Island. The State of New York was raising a customs barrier across the Hudson River to prevent the commerce of New Jersey from going into New York State and protecting that commerce for itself, and so on down the line. I might give hundreds of instances.

That was not only a commercial war, but it was rapidly approaching a condition where it would have been an actual war between the States if it had been allowed to progress.

Then men like George Washington gathered together to see if some arrangement could not be made to stop that war of commerce between the several States in the federation. Out of that meeting grew the subsequent meetings that ultimately gave birth to our present Constitution. The fathers realized that we could not hold the Union together if commerce in one State was to war on commerce in another State, and they adopted in the Federal Constitution the principles that there should be free trade in these United States, and that a man across a State line should have the same opportunity to dispose of his goods and push his commerce as a man on the other side of the State line.

The State commissions in some of the States have attempted to carry us back to the condition that was in existence before the adoption of the Federal Constitution, not by levying a tariff tax at the State line, but by establishing a railroad discrimination that would let the people in that State control the commerce by discrimination up to the State line against the people living across the State line. That has not only been attempted in the Senator's State, but in some other States, and that is absolutely contrary to the spirit of the Constitution as adopted by the fathers.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. KING. I do not want to interrupt the continuity of his able exposition of this subject, but my understanding has been that the contention made by the State in the case referred to by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] was that they were establishing a just and fair rate between the points within the State for freight and passengers with reference to the capital invested in the transportation companies, and not for the purpose of discriminating against any other State; and I think——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As to whether it was a fair rate within the State on the capital invested, of course that question would carry itself to the entire line in its ramifications on every freight rate they levied. This particular rate that was in controversy in the Shreveport case might have been fair and equitable where the distribution of the through rates might not have been. But that is not the question.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, it seems to me there can be a distinction between the two cases, one where the courts of the State justify a rate upon the ground that it is fair for the capital invested, and the attempt to justify a rate where it is discriminatory in aid of internal commerce. In the latter case the courts of the United States ought to reach out and interdict the enforcement of a decree of the State court on the ground that perhaps it was a violation of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution or at least some provision of the Constitution.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is a violation of the real purpose of the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution.

Mr. KING. Yes, and possibly depriving a person of his property without due process of law.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no contention with the Senator on that point at all. But the Senator from Texas has announced that by the legislation which he proposes in his amendment he purposes to take away from the Supreme Court the power to do the very thing I am contending for. That is the reason why I am objecting to his amendment. If the State commission is merely adjusting a fair business arrangement that is fair to its own people and not discriminatory against its neighbors, I have no objection to it, and I would be in accord with the Senator. But when he goes so far as to say that he offers this amendment to take away the power of the Supreme Court of the United States to say that there is no discrimination against one State in favor of another, I say it goes in the teeth of the very sentiment and foundation of the Constitution of the United States and can bring about nothing but an internecine war in commerce. If one State becomes involved in it, the other will respond, and, instead of having an easy and natural and continuous flow of the commerce of the country along natural lines, we will find ourselves blocked at the borders of every State in the Union by discriminatory railroad tariff rates. Therefore I think we ought to defeat the amendment as it is offered.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Would the Senator be willing to have an amendment such as I stated a few moments ago, which is simply a proviso "that the initiation and regulation of intrastate rates shall be restored to State control as provided prior to said act of March 21, 1918"? As I understand it, he is in accord with that amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection to it. Really, I will state to the Senator, so far as I am concerned, I have always been in favor of the position the Senator from Iowa is arguing here. I was opposed to its being taken away, and, if I could have followed my own lines, we would have let this piece of legislation go over until we take up the whole subject and bring in one single bill to legislate on. But the matter is before the Senate, and it is up to me to vote on it, and I intend to support the bill which the Senator from Iowa has in charge. I have no objection whatever myself to the proposition going as far as the Senator from Tennessee suggests. When we come down to bringing in a general railroad bill to meet the whole situation a few months from now, this thing may have to be changed and readjusted, but I am perfectly willing to restore the status quo in reference to the rate making as it stood before we took over the railroads.

As I understand the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee, I have no objection to it. I have not had a chance to study and read carefully the proposal of the Senator from Texas, but I take his own statement for it that it proposes to prevent the Supreme Court of the United States from continuing to prevent discriminations in commerce, as it did in the Shreveport case.

Mr. SHEPPARD. No, Mr. President.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understood the Senator to say that.

Mr. SHEPPARD. My position is subject to no such construction as that placed upon it by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understood the Senator to state that.

Mr. SHEPPARD. My object is to write the law so that it can not be construed in such a way as to discriminate against the States.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It takes away the power from the Federal court.

Mr. SHEPPARD. No.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is not my object. I desire to take away no proper power possessed by the court or the Government.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If it is not the object of the Senator, then I hope he will change his amendment. The Constitution of the United States gives the Federal Government power to control commerce between the States, but until the Congress puts a law on the statute books to carry out that amendment the Supreme Court of the United States has no power to enforce it. If by this amendment the Senator from Texas is seeking to repeal or modify the present law so as to take away the power of the Supreme Court of the United States to decide that question, we relegate the whole question back to limbo, where we found it before we adopted the Federal Constitution.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Permit me to say to the Senator that my object is to have the law in such a shape that States will be protected in the control of purely intrastate rates, having no relation to commerce between the States.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I know; but it is not only commerce between the States. Commerce does not mean the actual moving of commerce across a State line. The Supreme Court of the United States has gone far beyond that. If you bring, by reason of your State discrimination, your commerce in Texas up to the line of Louisiana by giving the cities in your State a preferential rate, and thereby prevent, by reason of that preferential rate, the commerce of the State of Louisiana from moving into the State of Texas, you are tearing down the fundamental principle of the Constitution.

Mr. SHEPPARD. In other words, on a shipment wholly within the State of Texas consumers must pay a higher freight rate in order that a city outside of the State of Texas may ship goods into that territory? And they may be compelled to do this, although the lower rate was established by the Texas State commission, after full hearing, and in due regard for sufficient revenue on capital invested?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is a situation which might become intolerable.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly that was the very purpose of granting the power to the Federal Government to regulate commerce between the States. It was in order that we might have free trade between the States of the Union, and the very purpose of the Senator's amendment would be to tear that down. More than that, I want to say that this is a very grave and a very important question, a question that should receive the most careful, full, and deliberate consideration, and I do not think it ought to be passed on by the Senate hastily by an amendment offered on the floor without a careful working out in some committee of the Senate. If the Senator merely wants to restore the status quo of these rate questions before we took the railroads over, I am willing to vote for it; but when he comes down to adopting a new rule, on which the Supreme Court of the United States must function, then I hope to defeat that amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may make a suggestion, if this power is to be conferred on the local authorities to the extent indicated by the amendment, it would enable the local authorities to fix a rate which would be out of all proportion to the interstate rate, and thereby place the burden of maintaining the system of transportation upon the interstate rates and relieve the State commerce to that extent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly. The Senator is entirely correct about that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I offer as a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas the amendment that I have already sent to the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On line 16, page 3, after the words "transportation systems," insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the initiation and regulation of intrastate rates shall be restored to State control, as provided prior to said act of March 21, 1918.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. SHEPPARD. While I do not modify in any way the position I have taken on this question, I realize that it opens up a tremendous field of discussion and one that should have careful analysis and investigation on the part of the Interstate Commerce Committee. Therefore, for the present I shall not insist upon my amendment, but I shall accept the substitute offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

I wish to insert at this point a brief argument which I made before the subcommittee of the Interstate Commerce Committee on this question a few years ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE COMMERCE,
UNITED STATES SENATE,
Friday, June 30, 1916.

* * * * * * *

STATEMENT OF HON. MORRIS SHEPPARD, A SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF TEXAS.

Senator SHEPPARD. Mr. Chairman, in view of the shortness of time, I shall make a very brief statement.

The amendment I have introduced is made necessary by the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission in a proceeding brought by the Railroad Commission of Louisiana, the decision having been rendered on March 11, 1912.

The complaint of the Louisiana Railroad Commission was based on the fact that the rate from Dallas and other Texas points into eastern Texas were lower than the rates into Texas from Shreveport for equal distances. The defendant carriers, the Texas & Pacific and the Houston, East & West Texas Railways, operated lines from Shreveport, La., to Dallas, Tex., and from Shreveport, La., to Houston, Tex., respectively. It was shown that for 60 cents first-class traffic was being carried from Dallas eastward to other Texas points, a distance of 160 miles, while from Shreveport, La., to Texas points the same amount would carry the same traffic only 55 miles.

The defendant carriers claimed that they were required to apply the rates out of Dallas and Houston by the Texas Railroad Commission.

The Interstate Commerce Commission held that the situation constituted an unjust discrimination against Shreveport and ordered the railways heretofore mentioned to charge no higher rates from Shreveport, La., to Texas points than the rates from Texas points eastward and northeastward to other Texas points for like distances. The commission established a scale of rates from Shreveport to Texas points for a distance of 182 miles on the Texas & Pacific Railway and 230 miles on the Houston, East & West Texas Railway.

Let me say here that Shreveport is situated in northwestern Louisiana, about 20 or 30 miles from the eastern border, while Dallas is in north central Texas, about 160 miles west from the east Texas border. Houston is about 250 miles southwest of Shreveport, about 230 miles of the distance being in Texas.

Three of the seven members of the Interstate Commerce Commission—Clements, Harlan, and McChord—dissented from the finding in the case, holding that the commission had no jurisdiction over State rates.

The action of the commission was upheld by the United States Supreme Court (234 U. S., 342). The court said [reading]:

"So far as these interstate rates conformed to what was found to be reasonable by the commission, the carriers are entitled to maintain them and they are free to comply with the order by so adjusting the other rates to which the order relates as to remove the forbidden discrimination. But this result they are required to accomplish."

The court held that the provision of section 1 of the interstate-commerce act that said act had no application to transportation wholly within a State had "appropriate reference to exclusively intrastate traffic, separately considered, and that that act was not limited by this premise when interstate commerce itself is involved."

In 1914 the railroad commission of Louisiana endeavored, by petition duly brought, to have the principles defined in the rulings of the Supreme Court and the Interstate Commerce Commission before quoted applied to the entire territory of Texas. The Interstate Commerce Commission refused this plea, but marked off a large section of the State by drawing a line from Gainesville south to the Brazos River and thence down the Brazos to its mouth, and applied the rules established by the decisions already described to the territory between that line and the western border of Texas. The commission held that in this territory commodity rates should not be greater than class rates, and that the western classification should be observed.

Vigorous objections came from Texas, and the commission ordered the entire matter reopened, the Louisiana commission urging that the rulings before alluded to be extended to all of Texas. This further investigation is still pending, and in the meantime the new rates have been suspended to await final decision. Such is the situation to-day.

Regardless of what the decision may be, the fact remains that the United States Supreme Court has held that the control of the Federal Government over interstate commerce means control over intrastate commerce or commerce wholly within the State. This means that rates on hauls inside a State must depend primarily on rates on hauls originating outside a State. It means that State boundaries are mere fiction and that State sovereignty is an empty name. The State of Texas has large and growing ports through which its wholesale centers receive goods for distribution among its people. And yet it makes no difference how low these inbound rates may be, how efficient the terminal and rail service may be from port to warehouse, how great the volume of business developed at these centers may be, how great and how legitimate the desire to build up enterprises by allowing the lowest consistent rate of carriage to points of delivery—if any or all these factors justify a rate to points within the State lower than the rate from a point outside of the State to the same points, although the point outside the State may not have a single factor in its favor equaling those I have mentioned, the rates from Texas centers to points in Texas must be kept at a parity with the rates from the point outside the State to the same points in Texas. The progress of 5,000,000 people, occupying 265,000 square miles of the most promising territory on the globe, must be subordinated to the interests of a far-inland city, of 35,000 people, in another State.

I have nothing but admiration for Shreveport. My frequent visits there have increased my admiration for its progressive and patriotic people. It has no right, however, to ask that the rate system, builded slowly and ably by the Texas Railroad Commission and adapted to Texas conditions, shall be overturned in order to promote its commercial fortunes.

The Texas Railway Commission can not, under the law, establish any rate unfair to the railroads or the people of Texas; any rate not productive of a fair return on the capital invested in their construction and operation. The State of Texas, through both its own and the Federal Constitution, has authorized its commission to supervise, establish, and regulate railway rates under these conditions. Under the division of powers peculiar to the present system of American Government, Texas has the right to control the rates on shipments entirely within its own borders. This right is part of its reserved sovereignty. To say to Texas that you must fashion your State rates from the standpoint of the interests of another State, and not your own, is to deny that Texas has any identity as a State.

As long as the Texas Railroad Commission fixes rates that are fair to the people and the carriers alike, it lies in nobody's mouth to say that they must rearrange them because interests outside of the State claim injury.

If we consider it desirable to have the Interstate Commerce Commission control intrastate rates, let an amendment to the Constitution be proposed in the usual way, and let the States say whether they wish to surrender the rights they now possess in this regard. Let not the rights be invaded by a process of slow and stealthy usurpation, in violation alike of the Constitution of the Union and the principles of State identity, State unity, and State integrity.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I merely wish to make a very brief statement in reference to the proposed amendment. It is the purpose of the bill to restore the status quo as to the initiation and changing of rates, fares, charges, classifications, regulations, and practices as exercised by the carriers now under Federal control prior to the 29th day of December last. In other words, it restores to the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to regulate rates. When the Government took over the control and operation of the railroads it took part of the jurisdiction that had formerly been exercised by the Interstate Commerce Commission. It also took over the jurisdiction and regulation of rates that had formerly been under control of the State commissions. I think it is manifestly unfair to restore to the Interstate Commerce Commission that part of the jurisdiction which refers to interstate rates and not to restore at the same time the status quo as to intrastate rates.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] on yesterday very clearly and forcefully pointed out the reasons why this jurisdiction over intrastate rates should be restored to the State commissions, and I feel sure that it is but fair and just, and in the very nature of things, that it ought to be done. We should restore the jurisdiction over all rates to the body that exercised that jurisdiction prior to the taking over of the railroads by the Government a year ago.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I wish very much that we were in a position to return these railways to their owners, in which event the full power and authority of the States over intrastate rates would be at once resumed, and very properly resumed; but I want the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] to remember that the Government of the United States, not as an established policy, but in order to meet an emergency, in order to aid in the prosecution of the war, is engaged in operating these properties, not as owner, but simply as an operator, simply for the purpose of carrying out its designs, which became necessary in the war. There must be a very great difference between that attitude and an attitude which we will assume when we have established a permanent policy and when we will remit to the State and local authorities all the powers they formerly exercised. If there is no distinction between those two conditions, then, of course, the view of the committee is wrong.

This very question was raised before the committee—that is, the inquiry whether, in the restoration of the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, we would at the same time take away from the President the right to make any rates in a State. Of course, the President has no right to make any rates in a State, except as he got it under the act of March 21, 1918. The committee was unanimous in its opinion that during the short period—we hope a short period—of Government control, in which the President is operating these properties simply for the purpose of caring for an emergency which was thrust upon the people of the United States, that the Government ought not to be required to go to the various State authorities and ask them what the rates for transportation in their respective States should be. I am impressed with the logic of that reasoning; and, as I said to the Senator from Minnesota yesterday, I shall be the last man to withdraw from the States the authority which I believe they have under the Constitution to manage, control, regulate, and supervise purely local business—their own rates—except as the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has said, when they come into contact with rates established by the Federal Government. In that event the Federal Government is, as always, supreme, and the State authority must yield to the general authority. But in the short period through which we are now passing I want the Senators who are suggesting this amendment to review what the situation would be. If we should adopt the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee, every 2-cent passenger rate in force, either by statute or through the orders of State commissions, would at once be restored; every reduction in rates that has been made by the State authorities would at once be resumed.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] may think that he can assist the people of Texas in having them ride at 2 cents a mile—although I do not know whether his State has such a statute or not—but if that practice is resumed somebody will have to pay the bill. We are already behind $240,000,000 for last year and we are behind more than that this year. Who will pay the bill? It must be paid by general taxation. If we permit the reduced rates in all the States to take effect again, the revenues of the railway companies will fall off accordingly, and we shall be compelled in that event to add to interstate rates, thus increasing the disparity which is so unfortunate if it exists at all.

I hope the Senate will not, during this temporary period, take away the power from the General Government, which we have given to the Government as a war measure to control rates until we have that legislation which we hope will compose the entire situation and will enable the railway companies to resume their business under normal conditions.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to ask, would not the same reasoning adopted by the Senator as to the States be equally strong as to taking away this war authority and giving it back to the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; the Interstate Commerce Commission is a Federal instrumentality. It is just as much charged with the duty from the Federal standpoint of maintaining these rates as is the Director General.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let me ask the Senator this question: Suppose the Interstate Commerce Commission should reduce rates generally, as it would have the right to do if this bill passed unamended, and the Director General of Railroads should increase intrastate rates, could not both of those things be done if the bill passes unamended?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] asked me practically the same question——

Mr. McKELLAR. I did not hear the question and the answer.

Mr. CUMMINS. And I answered him in this way: First, it is not conceivable, it is unthinkable, that any such situation shall arise; but if it should arise, in my judgment the Interstate Commerce Commission has entire authority to care for it. The Interstate Commerce Commission has now under the law the authority to create and to maintain the proper relation between the rates in a State and the rates for interstate traffic. It has that authority now.

Mr. McKELLAR. But where there is no relation between interstate and intrastate rates the Director General could apply such rates as he sees fit without regard to State authorities or to State commissions at all; he could increase in each State in the Union the intrastate freight and passenger rates, and he could increase those rates 50 per cent if he so desired and still be within his power, whereas——

Mr. CUMMINS. I have more confidence in a Democratic administration than to believe that is possible.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am submitting a strong case in order to show what the power is. Why leave that power there? If you are going to take away a part of this war power from the Railroad Administration, why not take it all away and restore the status quo?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have endeavored to keep it all in the hands of the Federal Government, where I believe it belongs, until the period of the emergency shall have passed and these properties shall be returned to their owners.

Mr. McKELLAR. But, as I understand the Senator, the Senator believes that the authority that existed within the States before the Federal Government took over the railroads should be ultimately restored to them?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think that there is nothing that can take it away from them. The Constitution preserves to the States, so far as the power to regulate commerce is concerned, whatever authority they have, and Congress is utterly powerless to withdraw that authority from the States. It was only the existence of war that made it possible for the Federal Government to assume the right to prescribe a purely State rate, assuming that it did not discriminate against an interstate rate.

We have not yet returned the property, and we know that we can not do so for some months to come. All that I am insisting upon is, until the period of this emergency shall have passed the power be retained in the Federal Government. I think that is a logical, sound position, and I can not imagine that the people of the States, who are citizens of the United States as well, can be injured by leaving the authority where it now is. Mark you, I do not propose to extend it, but I propose to leave it just where the act of March 21, 1918, placed it.

Mr. KELLOGG addressed the Senate. After having spoken for some time,

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have been informed that there are two or three Senators who desire to speak on this subject, and knowing that we can not conclude the bill to-night, if the Senator from Minnesota is entirely willing, I will make a motion to adjourn.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will yield for that purpose, and conclude to-morrow morning whatever other remarks I have to make.

Mr. CUMMINS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, June 12, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 11, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Infinite Spirit, our heavenly Father, in whom we live and move and have our being, let Thy spirit come mightily upon us, to inspire us with large conceptions of life, and truth, and justice; that we may render unto Thee the things that are Thine and unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and so fulfill the law and the prophets in all that we undertake this day; after the manner of the world's Great Exemplar. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE OF H. R. 5280.

Mr. McKINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for change of reference of the bill H. R. 5280 from the Committee on the Public Lands to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for a change of reference of bill H. R. 5280 from the Committee on the Public Lands to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What is it about, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. McKINLEY. Mr Speaker, the War Department bought a number of warehouses in Chicago, and among them a cold-storage warehouse. They had no use for the cold-storage warehouse after the armistice, and they traded with the Central Manufacturing Association for a dry-storage warehouse. They made the exchange. The manufacturing association paid a large amount of cash. They discovered when they were going to transfer the title they did not have full power, because the words "cold storage" were not in the power which they had under existing law. The bill was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and was in, if I remember correctly, the Senate bill which was reported but which did not pass. It is a matter for the War Department and one that belongs to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKINLEY. I will.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, this is purely a bill that belongs to the Military Committee and not to the Committee on the Public Lands. And in this connection may I again suggest to the gentleman that when they have requests of this kind to make they refer the matter, before making the requests, to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], who ought to be informed in regard to them before they are presented to the House. I was under the impression that the gentleman from Missouri had been informed with regard to this.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What is the title of this bill?

Mr. McKINLEY. It is "To authorize the President to dispose of real property by sale, exchange, lease, or otherwise."

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, if the House will bear with me a minute, I wish to say that I think the suggestion of the gentleman from Wyoming is correct. Somebody has to look after these matters, and unless the gentlemen who have bills inform those who are supposed to look after matters here it precipitates one of these talking fests every morning.

While I was Speaker I asked everybody who wanted to make a motion to recommit, except just a flat motion to recommit, to bring me the motions in advance—and I have no doubt the present Speaker will find that to be of advantage—so you can find out what is in them. Now, half the time you can not hear a thing that goes on in this House, anyhow. Gentlemen get up here with bills that I do not know anything about or anybody else knows anything about. They may be very meritorious, but we do not feel like letting them go through. I have no objection to this change of reference and think it ought to be made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to suggest that the Chair would be obliged if gentlemen who wish to ask unanimous consent would consult him in advance, and would suggest that in the future the Chair will probably not recognize anyone to ask unanimous consent unless he knows in advance the subject for which unanimous consent is asked.

Is there objection to the request made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKINLEY]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 3478) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 120) to repeal chapter 154 of the act of the second session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, being the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution to authorize the President in time of war to supervise or take possession and assume control of any telegraph, telephone, marine cable or radio system or systems, or any part thereof, and to operate the same in such manner as may be needful or desirable for the duration of the war, and to provide just compensation therefor," approved July 16, 1918, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

INVESTIGATION OF EXPENDITURES IN WAR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan presents a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Michigan to withhold that until I prefer a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. MAPES. I will withhold it.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from Kansas conferred with the gentleman from Wyoming and the gentleman from Missouri? He certainly has not conferred with the Chair.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I have conferred with the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES]. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 98.

Resolved, That the Select Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, appointed under the resolution of the House of Representatives adopted June 4, 1919, be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered to employ such stenographic, clerical, and legal assistance and such accountants, and to have such printing and binding done as it may deem necessary.

All expenses that may be incurred by said committee, including the expenses of said committee or any subcommittee thereof, when sitting outside of the District of Columbia, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives on vouchers signed by the chairman of said select committee, or by the chairman of a subcommittee, where such expenses are incurred by such subcommittee.

Also the following committee amendments were read:

Page 1, line 12, correct the spelling of the word "Representatives."
Page 1, line 10, strike out the comma after the word "thereof."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, the amendments have not been adopted yet.

The SPEAKER. The amendments were read. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] has the floor.

Mr. MAPES. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. I notice the resolution authorizes this select committee to employ legal counsel.

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I am informed, but I do not know whether my information is correct or not, that about 14 out of the 15 members of this select committee are able and eminent lawyers. I was informed last night by the chairman of this committee that, in his opinion, the committee did not need any legal advice; that it had plenty of legal ability on the committee to advise the committee in all respects. If that is the case, why authorize the employment of legal advice when there are so many eminent and able lawyers on this committee?

Mr. MAPES. I will say to the gentleman that what he says about there being eminent and able lawyers on the committee is true, and my understanding is that the committee does not intend to hire any general counsel, unless in the progress of the investigation it is found necessary to do so. This resolution was submitted to the full membership of the special committee, so the Committee on Accounts was informed, it was recommended unanimously by that committee and reported unanimously by the Committee on Accounts. The chairman of this special committee appeared before the Committee on Accounts and said to that committee that it was not his intention to hire counsel under this provision at present, but he thought the committee ought to have that right if it should be found necessary in the progress of the investigation to do so.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I am afraid if some of these men afterwards went back to the practice of law it might be a lasting reflection on their ability.

Mr. MAPES. Their desire to protect their dignity and standing as lawyers, I presume, will prevent them from hiring unnecessary counsel.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes; I yield.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know what may have been said in the committee in regard to the matter of employment of counsel, but I do not think the impression should be left with the House that this committee may not employ counsel, even general counsel—that term has been used—because I think the committee may find it proper and useful and helpful in the public interest to employ counsel. That has been done frequently in the past by committees of this sort. I do not think we should create any impression in the House that that may not be done, that whatever counsel may be deemed necessary and wise and proper may not be employed. My personal opinion is that one of the first things the committee should do would be the employment of counsel.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. MAPES. I desire to yield to one or two Members, but I suggest that we adopt the committee amendments before doing so.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. MAPES. I will yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I am a member of the Committee on Accounts, which considered this resolution, and I do not think it ought to be adopted by the House without the attention of the House being invited to the broad powers granted in it. There are almost unlimited powers given to the special committee and to the subcommittees that it might be divided into. As a member of the Committee on Accounts I did not object to it, because it was explained to the committee that various subcommittees would be appointed, and they might be sent to different parts of the United States, or perhaps across the water to France, to make certain investigations.

Now, in view of the fact that the House had heretofore authorized this special committee, we felt that we ought not to hamper it in any way in its investigation, and you will note that this resolution provides that the expenses may be paid upon the approval of the chairman of the various subcommittees. The reason why we authorized that and did not require these expenses to come back to the Committee on Accounts for approval was that the subcommittees may be away from Washington at various places throughout the United States or elsewhere. So I am inviting your attention to what is contained in this resolution in order that it may not be regarded as an established precedent. I would not have voted for it——

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. GARD. Is there any limitation on any expenditures for legal assistance?

Mr. HASTINGS. I was about to come to that, if the gentleman will permit. I was about to say that I believe that all these expenditures ought to be approved by the Committee on Accounts except in these exceptional instances.

Now, as to the employment of legal assistance, that question was brought up before the Committee on Accounts, and we were assured by the chairman of this special committee, Mr. GRAHAM, that it was not the purpose of his committee to employ any legal assistance to assist the committee in making any of the investigations, unless perhaps it might be that some subcommittee would find in some State a recalcitrant witness who refused to answer, and it might be necessary to go into the local court in some procedure that the members of the committee were not familiar with. But it was not the intention of the committee or any of these subcommittees to employ any general attorneys for the whole committee or any of the subcommittees.

I want to say to the House that as a member of the Committee on Accounts I asked the chairman of the special committee if he would not come before the House when this resolution was before it and make a statement to that effect, and he assured us that that statement would be forthcoming. I want to say to the House——

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. MAPES. I have been waiting to get an opportunity to yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] to make a statement, but so far I have been interrupted so that there has been no opportunity to do so.

Mr. HASTINGS. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I would not have made this statement if it had not been for the statement of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], which seemed to contradict the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM], the chairman of the special committee, before our committee yesterday morning; and if the chairman of the special committee is ready to make such a statement now before the House I am perfectly willing to yield.

But I want to state before yielding that I would not have voted for this resolution in the committee except upon the assurance of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] that it was not the purpose of the committee to employ any general counsel to assist in the development of the facts before the committee, but only in those exceptional cases where witnesses perhaps would decline to answer and where it might be necessary to go into some court and compel them to answer. Now I yield.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I interrupted the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] to say that I desired to yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM], who is chairman of this special committee, and the only reason why I had not done so before was because of the interruption of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS], who is a member of the Committee on Accounts. His interruption, of course, was perfectly proper. But I had no opportunity up to this time to yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM]. I now yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM], the chairman of the special investigating committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker and the gentlemen of the House, the other day the House authorized the appointment of a special committee to investigate the expenditures in the War Department. The Speaker honored me by selecting me as chairman of that committee. During the discussions on the proposition I have not taken the floor, and this is my first opportunity to say anything about it.

The work entailed on this committee is necessarily very extensive and will take the constant efforts of the members of that committee for several months to come. In my judgment at least six months will be taken by the membership of the committee in their investigation of these vast expenditures.

As soon as the committee was appointed it was necessary to make some sort of an organization, and I may say to the gentlemen of this House that up to this time no organization of any kind has been effected. The committee has met, but inasmuch as it had no authority by the rules of the House to employ any clerical or other assistance, none has been employed, and hence the work is piling up in my office. My private clerk is swamped with it, and I have as yet no help and have engaged none, nor have I spoken to anyone.

It must be evident to anyone who thinks about the thing that considerable help will be needed. It will be necessary to divide the work of this committee into subdivisions. Just the exact subdivisions have not been worked out by the committee yet, but will be in the near future, as soon as we have the authority to proceed and employ our clerical help. It will be necessary to have several clerks. It will be necessary to have a stenographic force. It undoubtedly will be necessary to have a firm or a number of accountants who can go into the books and accounts of the War Department and can ascertain from an inspection of those books things that we, the members of the committee, do not know. So far as I am personally concerned, I will say frankly to the House that I have no knowledge whatever of bookkeeping or of the keeping of accounts of that kind, and I think the membership of the committee pretty generally are in the same condition of mind; so that it will be necessary in the outstart of our work to hire accountants to represent us. Now, I will say this as regards the matter of counsel. I have said it to the Committee on Accounts and I have said it to men on my own side of the House who have inquired about it: Fourteen of the members of this committee are lawyers. I would like to have this committee go through this work just as economically as it is possible to do it. We expect by the work of the committee to effect economies in the administration of the War Department, and therefore it is not proper, it seems to me, for us to set an example of waste and extravagance in the conduct of the affairs of this committee; and the committee intend, so far as I have talked with them personally, to be as economical as possible. As I say, 14 of us are attorneys in our private business. The other member of the committee is a better lawyer than most of us who are admitted to the bar. So that I think we are reasonably competent to handle the matters suggested to us. I have heard no suggestion from anyone on the committee up to this time that there would be any general counsel employed; but I want to say this to you, that I think it might become necessary under some circumstances for counsel to be employed. I have told the Committee on Accounts that so far as I am personally concerned I do not intend to ask for the appointment of any general counsel until it is necessary to do so. If it is necessary, then the committee will act upon that proposition.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I apprehend that the gentleman will find it will become necessary to employ general counsel, somebody who is thoroughly familiar with the legislation under which the Government has been conducted in carrying on this World War. In other words, I should say if he were not more familiar with it than I am, multiplied by ten, most of the time would be taken up in determining what the law is rather than inquiring into what had been done.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That may be true. I want to say to you now that my personal judgment is that we ought not to employ general counsel at large expense until we get to a place where we need the assistance of such counsel, and if we need it then we ought to have it, because this investigation that we are starting upon making ought to go to the bottom of these things and ought to find out the facts thoroughly. Both sides of this House are intent upon having that done, I imagine, and it will be done so far as the committee are concerned. So that in the end this vast expenditure of the War Department can be carefully and conscientiously audited and the people of this country may know the facts about the expenditures of this war, as they have a right to know them.

Now, I find in looking over the precedents—I will not weary you with them—that this resolution only follows examples that have been adopted in the past. The so-called leak resolution was adopted in January, 1917. In that proceeding a resolution was offered by Mr. GARRETT to this effect:

That in the performance of the duties imposed upon it by reference to it of House resolution 446 the Committee on Rules shall have the power * * * to employ such stenographic and clerical assistance as may be necessary. The expenses incurred hereunder shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives on vouchers ordered by this committee and signed by the chairman thereof and approved by the Committee on Accounts, evidenced by the signature of the chairman thereof.

Afterwards, on January 17, Mr. POU, from the same committee, offered the following additional resolution:

Resolved, That in the consideration of House resolutions 420, 429, and 446, referred to the Committee on Rules, said committee be, and is—authorized and empowered to employ counsel to aid in conducting the investigations which it has been directed by the House to make, and also to employ such expert accountants familiar with stock exchange transactions as may be found necessary in conducting said investigations.

Now, notice this language—

In an additional section it was stated that—

The expenses incident to the employment of counsel and accountants and those of the committee or subcommittee when sitting outside of Washington shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers signed by the chairman or acting chairman of said committee.

That precedent is almost exactly like the one we are considering.

In the Ballinger-Pinchot investigation held in 1910 a resolution introduced by Mr. Dalzell provided as follows:

* * * To employ stenographers * * * and to employ such assistance, legal and otherwise, as may be deemed necessary.

All the costs and expenses of said investigation, including all necessary printing, shall be paid one-half from the contingent fund of the Senate and one-half from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

There are many other precedents which I do not care to worry you with. In short, let me say I think the House will have to trust the committee to exercise reasonable discretion in making reasonable expenses. So far as I am concerned, I say frankly it will be my effort—and I think I speak for a majority of the committee—to keep down expenses to a reasonable basis and not spend anything out of the Public Treasury that we are not necessarily required to do. If you want the investigation, let us make it right. If we have to have a lawyer—if the united judgment of the committee is that it is necessary—we ought to have the right to employ one. You will have to trust our judgment, discretion, and good sense, hoping and knowing, as I believe you do, that we will exercise the best judgment that we have about the matter.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I will yield.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I want to ask if the gentleman is not inclined to the opinion that he should follow the precedents of the Pou investigation and ask now for only such help as he needs. The gentleman states that he does not yet contemplate that they will need legal help just now, and, if they find out later that legal assistance is necessary, let him come in and ask for it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I do not think so, and I will tell the gentleman why. When we get into the investigation many facts will develop. It ought not to be necessary for us to have to stop the work of a subcommittee or the full committee to come into the House and precipitate a discussion about whether we ought to, on account of certain facts then developing before the committee, to hire a lawyer.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I am sure we are all gratified that the gentleman from Illinois, chairman of this important committee, is desirous to keep as low as practicable the expenditures by his committee. But I think the House should understand the magnitude of this investigation, and that there should be no question in the minds of any gentlemen with regard to the possibility of its costing a considerable amount of money. The gentleman from Illinois calls attention to the fact that in a number of instances, with regard to investigations of comparatively limited importance, resolutions almost identical with the one before the House have been passed without any question.

We must trust this committee. The War Department since the war began has expended an enormous sum of money—over sixteen billions—and it has expended it under the trying conditions of war. The American people expect there shall be a fair and honest examination of these expenditures. That is what we anticipate and what we hope for. It will cost a considerable amount of money, and my own personal opinion is that even this splendid committee of able lawyers will need counsel, and they will need what is sometimes called general counsel, and they will need them very early in their investigation.

The fact that counsel is employed, as in the past, will not reflect on these gentlemen, as everybody knows who is familiar with this sort of thing. I do not want to have the resolution adopted with the impression in the minds of any gentlemen that there is going to be any hesitation about employing such counsel and such assistance as may be necessary for the proper investigation that I trust we all on both sides desire. I do not want to leave the impression—it would not be fair to leave an impression—with the House and the country that we do not expect that this investigation will cost much. It may cost a very considerable amount of money. I believe it will. The expenditures will be kept as low as is consistent with a thorough investigation.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the genleman yield me five minutes?

Mr. MAPES. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I think everybody is in favor of this resolution. I know I am. It is absolutely necessary for these gentleman to have clerical help. It is absolutely necessary for them to have accountants. It is absolutely necessary for them to have stenographers. Any Member of any considerable experience knows that when some new duty is added to his other duties he gets his own business in a very much belated condition.

Inasmuch as the House has entered on this adventure, which is a very large one, it ought to be made absolutely thorough from top to bottom. There is no question about that. As far as we are concerned on our side, we have no fear about the results of this investigation. As far as employing lawyers is concerned, as a general rule 15 men can conduct these matters—14 of them are lawyers, and very good lawyers—but there may arise some very close and difficult legal problems about the responsibility of people, or about the validity of contracts, that these men would not have time to investigate personally; and on the assurance of the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] that lawyers will not be employed unless they are needed, I see no objection to it.

We all went into this war to win it, and I am going to just take a minute to tell you what I think about this whole business. It will be constantly bobbing up during this Congress as to what happened and what did not happen. I want to say incidentally that I am growing exceedingly weary of so many gentlemen devoting so much time to nagging and criticizing, whether they know anything about what they are talking about or not, and if they do not quit it I am going to get enough time here some day to dress off the whole crowd of naggers. [Applause and laughter.]

The truth is that we got into a stupendous job in that war, and it was sprung suddenly. I do not believe that 5 per cent of the people in the United States believed that we were going to get into that war until we were in it. They kept hoping that we would be able to keep out of it; and we did everything that the Germans thought we could not do, and if they had believed that we could do it they never would have dragged us in. That was to raise a great army, drill it, and send it across the sea in time to help give them a whaling. [Applause.] That is what was the matter with them, and if I were to live a thousand years and studied about it all of the time I would never be able to find out why they did not know that, if we wanted to, we could raise an army of 15,000,000 men and put them in the field, and that practically our material resources are illimitable.

A vast amount of money was spent. We spent the greatest sum that was ever spent by any nation since the world began—forty or fifty billions—and we had to do everything at once. We were all as green as gourds about war. The President was green, and we were green, and the Senate was green, and the American people were green about war.

In the two Houses of Congress there was but one man who had ever set a squadron in the field, and that was Gen. SHERWOOD, who fought in 43 pitched battles during the Civil War. I tell you what I believe will be found out when this is all investigated, and that is that there was some extravagance, a good deal of it, growing out of the hurry with which we did things and the size of the undertaking, and that incompetents were found here and there. You could not study a week to determine whether you would make a man a captain or a colonel or anything of that kind; and, like every war that is sprung suddenly, as this was, there were incompetents up and down the line. There were a good many profiteers, and I wish every one was in the penitentiary, I do not care whether he is a big or a little fellow. [Applause.] I would not be at all surprised if somewhere along the line they found some absolute dishonesty, some plain stealing—not much, but some by some underlings. It has been that way in every war we have ever had. War furnishes opportunity for all sorts of gouging and profiteering. Nevertheless, taken all together, our achievement in conducting the war is splendid, magnificent, glorious.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Michigan to yield me five minutes more.

Mr. MAPES. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It was that way in the Civil War; it was that way even in the brief War with Spain. Those of us who were here then know that the very same complaints were made, and some of them were ascertained to be true. What we want, and I suppose what you Republicans want, is a fair deal in this examination; but my suggestion is that everybody quit nagging and criticizing and lampooning until we ascertain the truth as the result of this investigation which we are undertaking and which is going to cost a good deal of money. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I take it for granted that nearly everybody engaged in the war desired to do his duty faithfully and well. Some of them did not know how, some of them had to learn how, some of them never did learn how, and some of them never did any good. Take such a vast army as we had in France, and there was bound to be injustices done. You could not run an institution so big as that without it. Accidents happen. Take the expenditure of money here. It is something dreadful, and in the meantime a great many of the newspapers hopped on Congress, no matter what Congress did. We took two days here to pass the first great bond bill, authorizing $7,000,000,000, and the newspapers hopped on us because we did not pass that bill in one day.

When I went home that night, or down to the hotel, after I had signed the bill my wife said to me, "When you ran for Congress the first time you put in about half of your time lambasting Speaker Reed and his Congress for being a billion-dollar Congress. Suppose somebody had got up in the audience and said, 'Mr. CLARK, you will live to sign a bill after two days' consideration that carries seven billion of dollars,' what would you have thought about it?" I replied that I would have said that the fellow who said such a thing ought to be put into a strait-jacket in a padded cell. [Laughter.] That is the way the American people thought about it.

It is astounding that we raised an Army of four million and a half men and sent over two millions of them to France in a few months, that we gave sustenance and help and food and raiment to half the nations in Europe and are still not bankrupt ourselves. [Applause.] It is the most monumental job ever undertaken by the children of men, and we accomplished it and accomplished it well and thoroughly, and as Admiral Schley said about the results of the naval victory in Cuban waters, there is glory enough for all. Let us quit quarreling. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment——

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I offered the amendment before the gentleman moved the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman did not, because he was not recognized for that purpose.

Mr. BLANTON. I asked the Chair to take notice that I desired to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair took notice of it. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution as amended.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. I offer a motion to recommit it to the committee.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed and to lay that on the table.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask to be recognized to offer a motion to recommit to the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that this resolution be recommitted to the Committee on Accounts with instructions to forthwith report it back to the House, with the following amendments, to wit:

On line 5, page 1, after the word "clerical," strike out the comma and the words "and legal."

And if it is in order I would like to be heard on the motion to recommit.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the motion comes too late.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the motion comes too late. The resolution has been passed. This is not like a bill where there are three readings. It is a simple resolution, and there is but one reading, and the resolution has been agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. During what stage of the proceedings in action upon a House resolution does it become in order to offer a motion to recommit to the committee unless it is immediately after the vote taken on the passage?

The SPEAKER The Chair would say at any time before the passage.

Mr. BLANTON. The bill has not been passed finally, I submit as a point of order.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to be heard?

Mr. BLANTON. I desire to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I lay down the broad, true proposition that a lawyer is a poor criterion to fix the fee of another lawyer——

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MAPES. That the gentleman is not discussing the point of order that he raised.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas must, of course, discuss the point of order as to why the motion to recommit is in order.

Mr. BLANTON. I thought the Chair recognized me on the motion.

The SPEAKER. No; on the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the motion to recommit any piece of legislation is after the bill has been engrossed and read the third time.

The SPEAKER. And before it has been passed.

Mr. BLANTON. After it has been engrossed and read the third time. Then, as I understand it, it is in order to offer a motion to recommit. As I understand it, the vote which was taken in the House on this resolution was the same as a vote to engross and read the bill the third time, and I submit——

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I make the point of order that the Chair has ruled upon the question——

The SPEAKER. The Chair decided that he would hear the gentleman on his point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. I submit to the Speaker in all fairness and in all earnestness that the Speaker saw and heard me on my feet stating that I desired to offer an amendment before the motion was made by the chairman of this committee for the previous question. The Speaker, of course, had the right to ignore a Member on the floor. The Speaker has it in his power to ignore any man on the floor who desires to offer an amendment to a piece of legislation and be heard upon it, but I take it that under the statement that the Speaker made to the House at the time he was elected Speaker in this great House of Representatives that he would at all times be fair to every Member concerning all legislation offered——

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I raise a question of order that the gentleman is entirely out of order. The Speaker has ruled upon the question, the resolution has been adopted, and there is nothing before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. REAVIS. I make the point of order that the lecture the gentleman is giving the Chair is not a discussion of the point of order now before the House and that he is not speaking to the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must confine himself to the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I submit I have done everything within the power of a Member of this House to offer an amendment to change the reading and terms of this resolution.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. BLANTON. Not right now; I am speaking to the point of order. [Laughter.] I submit, Mr. Speaker, in all fairness that I have a good motion here, a motion which would tend to perfect this resolution in the interest of the chairman of the select committee, if you please, in the interest of the chairman of the Committee on Accounts, along with the very purpose and intention of the chairman of the select committee on investigation. If properly amended, I am not against this resolution——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will confine himself to the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Therefore I submit to the Speaker, if I am to be cut off from offering an amendment, what other way have I to propose to the House of Representatives a change in this resolution, except that the Speaker had ruled me out of order and after the Speaker had ruled the previous question in order to make a motion immediately thereafter to recommit this resolution?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule. The gentleman from Texas rose and said he wished to offer an amendment, and at the same time the gentleman from Michigan who had charge of the bill rose and moved the previous question. The Chair followed the precedent of all Speakers in recognizing the gentleman who had charge of the bill for the motion for the previous question. If the House wished to consider the amendment of the gentleman from Texas and did not wish the previous question it could have voted it down. The previous question, however, was ordered by the House and the gentleman then made no motion to recommit. The resolution itself was then adopted, and after the resolution was adopted the gentleman from Texas offered a motion to recommit. The time for the motion to recommit is before the passage of a bill, but a resolution differs from an ordinary bill, because with an ordinary bill there is a third reading and after that and before the passage of the bill the motion to recommit must be made. Here there was no third reading, so there was but one motion for the passage of the resolution and the motion to recommit should have been made before that motion. It can not be made after the resolution has passed. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed and to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed and to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to make the motion.

Mr. BLANTON. I object to the two motions being put.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to reconsider——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider and lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to reconsider and lay the motion on the table.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes had it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count.

Mr. BLANTON (during the count). Mr. Speaker, I will not delay the proceedings now.

The SPEAKER (after counting). Two hundred and twenty-seven Members are present, a quorum.

So the motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 3478, the third deficiency bill, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and to ask for a conference with the Senate.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will allow the Chair to state the motion. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 3478, being an appropriation bill, to disagree to all of the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3478) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for prior fiscal years, and for other purposes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the chairman of the committee that by amendment No. 49 the Senate has placed as a rider upon this appropriation bill a provision appropriating $272,000 for the United States Employment Service, in a blanket appropriation, without any limitations or restrictions. If the unanimous request of the gentleman is permitted, will the gentleman now assure the House that before amendment No. 49 is agreed to in conference he will give the membership of this House a chance to vote on that amendment separately?

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman that but very few days remain of this fiscal year. I think he will appreciate the conferees will have to work with considerable expedition to get the bill in shape and have it passed before the end of the fiscal year. I hope that our work may progress in such a way that if there is any desire on the part of the House to vote on that particular amendment they may have that right. But to say to the House that this amendment or that amendment will be brought back, I hardly think is a question that gentlemen ought to ask.

Mr. BLANTON. May I ask the gentleman this question: After the statement made by an auditor of this Government, which I placed in the RECORD yesterday, concerning the manner in which the $5,500,000 of blanket appropriations heretofore made by this Congress have been spent and thrown away and wasted by this United States Employment Service, is the gentleman in favor of permitting this amendment No. 49 to remain in the bill?

Mr. GOOD. In regard to that, whether I am in favor of any amendment or not, is hardly the question that should govern the conferees. So far as possible they should carry out, if possible, the will of the body they represent. We must agree to the bill in some way, and I do not see how the conferees in agreeing to the bill can take into question some alleged waste that might result. But I will say to the gentleman that if he can convince the conferees that there is any—or, I do not say a majority, but even a respectable number of the membership of the House—when this particular amendment is brought before the House, I am sure there will be no disposition on the part of the conferees to do otherwise than to comply with the request.

Mr. BLANTON. I took it for granted that the House would want to vote on that question, to properly safeguard this $272,000 of the people's money.

Mr. GOOD. If the gentleman is convinced of that fact, there will be no disposition to prevent a vote.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman can give us no assurance that there will be?

Mr. GOOD. I can not.

Mr. BLANTON. Then I object.

MEMORIAL FROM PHILIPPINE COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from the Philippines [Mr. DE VEYRA] be permitted to present a unanimous-consent request at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from the Philippines [Mr. DE VEYRA] is recognized to prefer a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. DE VEYRA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a memorial from the Commissioners from the Philippines to the joint commission of the House and Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from the Philippines asks unanimous consent that a memorial by the Commissioners from the Philippines be inserted in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

CORRECTION IN ENROLLMENT OF INDIAN BILL.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk a resolution, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That in the enrollment of the bill H. R. 2480, entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920," the Clerk be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to strike out the word "and" in line 14 of page 66 of said bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. WALSH. That ought to be explained, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the enrolling clerk in enrolling the bill found the word "and" a superfluous one, and which disjointed a sentence, and it is for the purpose of making it read correctly that this resolution is introduced.

Mr. WALSH. I did not know that the word "and" ever disjointed anything. I thought it had the contrary effect.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, is this a joint resolution?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It is a concurrent resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes, in order to bring to the attention of the House what I consider the greatest single-handed achievement of a private soldier in the recent war.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McCLINTIC] asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. KAHN. I will have to object to that, and would suggest to the gentleman that he can do it under the five-minute rule when the Army bill is up for consideration.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I renew the request that I made, to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 3478, disagree to all of the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference with the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 3478, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3478) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection, provided the conferees——

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, there is no qualification in that. The gentleman must either object or he does not object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair agreed to recognize the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move now that the conferees be instructed to insist on the elimination of Senate amendment No. 49.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against the motion that if such a motion should be passed by the House we would have no conference, that the House Members would be bound to go over there and do a thing which the Senate would not consider under any circumstances.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's point of order is in the nature of an argument against the motion of the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. The ground of my point of order is that the gentleman's point of order is not in order under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is in order under the rule. The gentleman from Texas moves that the conferees be instructed to disagree to Senate amendment No. 49.

Mr. BLANTON. And on that, Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays are demanded. Those in favor of taking the vote by yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Only two gentlemen have risen, and the yeas and nays are refused. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 2, noes 216.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair counted 218, a quorum.

Mr. BLANTON. I demand tellers, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MADDEN. I make the point of order that the demand for tellers is not in order to verify the count of the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks he has discretion as to that, but the Chair wishes to be fair and will order tellers.

Mr. WALSH. No, Mr. Speaker; it is proper to ask for a count. The gentleman from Texas demanded tellers, and the tellers should only be granted by count of the House.

The SPEAKER. On what ground does the gentleman from Texas demand tellers?

Mr. BLANTON. I thought possibly the Chair might have made a mistake, he being human.

The SPEAKER. The Chair regrets to say that the gentleman is not allowed to ask for tellers on that ground. The rules do not allow it. The noes have it, and the Chair appoints the following conferees on the part of the House: Mr. GOOD, Mr. CANNON, and Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. LINTHICUM (at the request of Mr. COADY), by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence indefinitely, on account of illness.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague [Mr. MURPHY] be granted leave of absence for seven days, on account of serious illness in his family.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that hereafter such requests be handed in in regular form to the Chair.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 5227, the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 5227, the Army appropriation bill, with Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 5227, the Army appropriation bill. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5227) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

CONTINGENCIES OF THE ARMY.

For all contingent expenses of the Army not otherwise provided for and embracing all branches of the military service, including the office of the Chief of Staff; for all emergencies and extraordinary expenses, including the employment of translators, and exclusive of all other personal services in the War Department or any of its subordinate bureaus or offices at Washington, D. C., or in the Army at large, but impossible to be anticipated or classified; to be expended on the approval and authority of the Secretary of War, and for such purposes as he may deem proper, including the payment of a per diem allowance not to exceed $4, in lieu of subsistence, to employees of the War Department traveling on official business outside of the District of Columbia and away from their designated posts, $1,000,000.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I wish to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 2, line 15, strike out "$1,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$300,000."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, my amendment proposes to reduce the amount in this item from $1,000,000 to $300,000. The amount passed by the last Congress under this item was $100,000, so that in my amendment I allow an addition of $200,000 for any unexpected expenditure which might be authorized under this section.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. CARTER. I did not catch from the reading what the item was for.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is for contingencies for the Army. We appropriated last year $100,000. This bill carries $1,000,000.

Mr. CARTER. What is that used for? Will the gentleman explain that?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. As I explained in my statement before the committee the day before yesterday, the greater part of this $1,000,000 would go to the support of the bureau of the director of sales of surplus supplies. My statement will be found on page 903 of the RECORD, and I call the attention of the committee to the testimony in the hearings, commencing on page 415. Mr. Hare, the director of the sales department, formerly of the United States Gas & Improvement Co. of Philadelphia, draws a salary of $25,000. You will find his testimony in the hearings. His first assistant receives a salary of $10,000, and he has two assistants receiving a salary of $8,000 each, and he has nine chiefs of sections receiving $6,000 each.

Some of this money will also be needed by Mr. Hare to take a trip to Europe for a week. He says that he has no accurate knowledge of conditions of foreign markets. Let me read you what he says, on page 419 of the hearings. He says:

I have at the moment no accurate knowledge. But my thought was, if it was decided to make an appropriation as asked for, that before I could tell the Secretary what kind of an organization I needed I should take two of my best men and perhaps go to Europe for a week or so to size up the situation, and then come back. I do not believe it is practical to size up the situation accurately from this side. It certainly would not be my intention, inside of the next week or two, if we were given the authority, to say I should take over any number of men to Europe. I think the thing has got to be approached carefully and a study made, which we have not yet had time to make.

That is only to give you an idea of some of the plans proposed for which this $1,000,000 is asked. I will ask the gentlemen of the committee to read carefully the testimony of Mr. Hare. He testified that he was desirous of making a good record—and that is commendable—and that he wanted the best available assistance; that the men he now has in his service were all making more money in civil life, and that he needed more help. Now, the implication naturally is that these salaries are to be increased and more experts employed.

I do not know Mr. Hare. He is a splendid looking gentleman—a great, big, fine, strapping man—and as he sat there testifying I could not help thinking how splendid he would have looked in khaki uniform. He says that he has several officers, very able and capable men, assisting him, but that these officers are only drawing the salaries of their rank. Now, gentlemen, he admits that he has capable officers in his various departments.

Will anyone here explain why we can not take those officers—why they can not be formed into a committee to dispose of these surplus supplies?

I want to call the attention of the committee to the copper contract, which appears on page 426 of the hearings. Here it is:

EXHIBIT I.

DIRECTOR OF SALES CONTRACT NO. III—UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND UNITED METALS SELLING CO.—PURCHASE, STORAGE AND TRAFFIC DIVISION, UNITED STATES ARMY—CONTRACT FOR SALE OF COPPER.

APRIL 10, 1919.

This contract, made this 10th day of April, 1919, by and between the United States of America, by C. W. Hare, director of sales (hereinafter called the contracting officer), acting under direction of the Director of Purchase, Storage and Traffic, and under authority of the Secretary of War, pursuant to the provisions of an act of Congress approved July 9, 1918 (Public—193—65th Cong., p. 6), of the first part, and the United Metals Selling Co., a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Delaware, acting for and on behalf of various copper producers, and having its principal office at 42 Broadway, New York, N. Y. (hereinafter called the purchaser), of the second part: Witnesseth,

Whereas certain copper hereinafter described has been procured and acquired by the United States since April 6, 1917; and

Whereas the United States deems it expedient to dispose of the same to the best advantage:

Now, therefore, the parties hereto, in consideration of the mutual agreements herein contained, have agreed and do hereby agree as follows:

ARTICLE 1. Material to be sold: The United States shall sell and deliver to the purchaser not more than 100,000,000 pounds of electrolytically refined copper, or at its option prime Lake copper, 99.9 per cent pure, and not more than 5,000,000 pounds of copper scrap, and the purchaser shall receive and pay for the same upon the following terms and conditions:

ART. 2. Shapes and grades: A. The copper is to be in the usual commercial shapes of ingots, ingot bars, wire bars, cakes, or slabs.

B. Copper in other than the usual commercial shapes (determined by agreement between an experienced and duly authorized representative of the contracting officer and an experienced and duly authorized representative of the purchaser, and, in the event of their failure to agree, by a third person selected by those two, whose decision shall be final and binding on both parties) shall be delivered to the nearest available refinery at the cost of the United States.

C. Copper scrap, which term shall include what is usually known as scrap, provided the copper is not alloyed with any other metal, shall be delivered at the cost of the United States to the nearest available refinery equipped for handling such material.

The copper content of such scrap copper shall be determined at the refinery by electrolytic assay.

Should any dispute arise as to the assay, a sample of the scrap copper shall be submitted for analysis to Lucius Pitkin (Inc.), 47 Fulton Street, New York City, or Ledroux & Co., 99 John Street, New York City, for determination of analysis. The fee and expense involved in such analysis shall be paid by the party in error.

The purchaser shall furnish to the contracting officer certified assay and sworn weight certificates.

ART. 3. Inventory: The quantity and location of the copper and copper scrap shall be in accordance with an inventory attached to and made a part of this contract, and marked "Schedule A." At any time within three months from the date of this contract the contracting officer may furnish to the purchaser additional inventories for copper and/or copper scrap, provided the purchaser may refuse to purchase any copper or copper scrap included under said additional inventories, and in such event shall give a written notice thereof to the contracting officer within 10 days of the receipt of any additional inventory.

Subject to all terms and conditions of this contract, the quantities included in additional acceptable inventories shall be delivered and paid for in approximately equal quantities each month during the unexpired term of this contract.

The copper and copper scrap specified in said inventories shall be the copper and copper scrap sold and purchased hereunder.

ART. 4. Shipping: The cost of loading the copper or copper scrap on cars or lighters will be paid by the United States, except loading charges at the plants or refineries of the purchaser. From time to time upon receipt of shipping instructions the United States will promptly load the copper or copper scrap specified in said shipping instructions on cars or lighters furnished by it.

Title to the copper in usual commercial shapes shall pass on loading at the locations designated in Schedule A, as evidenced by bill of lading or other document showing shipment, except as hereinafter provided, and no further responsibility shall attach to the United States in respect thereto.

If in the judgment of the purchaser it should be necessary to transfer not more than 50 per cent of the copper herein contracted for from such location as may be designated by the contracting officer to the Raritan Arsenal or to such other United States depot as may be agreed upon by the parties to this contract, such transfer, at the cost of the United States, will be made with reasonable dispatch. In such event title to the copper so transferred will pass upon loading at said arsenal or such other United States depot as evidenced by bill of lading or other document showing shipment, and no further responsibility shall attach to the United States in respect thereto.

Title to copper in other than usual commercial shapes and to scrap copper shall pass on delivery at the plants or refineries of the purchaser, and no further responsibility shall attach to the United States in respect thereto.

The purchaser shall pay the cost of transporting said copper in other than usual commercial shapes, and said scrap copper from the locations designated in Schedule A or in additional acceptable inventories to the nearest available refinery equipped for the handling of such material. Transportation charges so paid shall be deducted from the amounts due from the purchaser to the United States. Adjustment of transportation charges will be made on monthly settlement days, it being the intention of this contract that the United States shall reimburse the purchaser for all transportation charges paid by it in accordance with the provisions of this article. The purchaser shall furnish to the contracting officer sworn statements of freight charges paid, together with copies of receipted freight bills.

ART. 5. Delivery: The copper delivered by the United States and taken by the purchaser shall be not less than the quantities indicated in the following schedule of deliveries:

	Pounds.
During the month of April, 1919	5,000,000
During the month of May, 1919	5,000,000
During the month of June, 1919	5,000,000
During the month of July, 1919	5,000,000
During the month of August, 1919	5,000,000
During the month of September, 1919	5,000,000
During the month of October, 1919	5,000,000
During the month of November, 1919	5,000,000
During the month of December, 1919	5,000,000
During the month of January, 1920	5,000,000
During the month of February, 1920	10,000,000
During the month of March, 1920	10,000,000
During the month of April, 1920	10,000,000
During the month of May, 1920	10,000,000
During the month of June, 1920	10,000,000

Should the total sales of copper owned or controlled by the purchaser and all producers of copper represented by it in any one month during the months of April, 1919, to January, 1920, both inclusive, exceed 50,000,000 pounds, and during the months of February, 1920, to June, 1920, both inclusive, exceed 100,000,000 pounds, in such event the quantities specified in the above schedule shall be increased by an amount equal to 20 per cent of such excess. It is further agreed that by mutual agreement between the contracting officer and the purchaser that the quantities specified in this article may be further increased in any one month.

Deliveries of such excess quantity shall be made during the succeeding month, the copper to be paid for at the contract price during the month within which such additional copper was sold. It is understood that such increase shall not relieve the purchaser from its obligation to take the schedule requirements for any subsequent month until all the copper and copper scrap herein contracted for has been taken.

The purchaser shall furnish to the contracting officer on the 5th day of each succeeding month during the currency of this contract a sworn statement of the total sales of the preceding month, as reported by the producers represented by it.

It is expressly understood and agreed that the entire quantity of copper and copper scrap herein contracted for shall be taken and removed by the purchaser on or before June 30, 1920.

ART. 6. Weighing: The copper herein contracted for shall be weighed at the cost of the United States at the locations designated in Schedule A, or at the locations designated in additional acceptable inventories, or at the Raritan Arsenal, or other acceptable United States depot, by experienced and duly qualified weighers. The purchaser may at its expense maintain an inspector at the point at which each shipment is weighed. Such inspector shall have authority to properly inspect scales and weights. Any disputes as to weights shall be determined by agreement between an experienced and duly authorized representative of the contracting officer and an experienced and duly authorized representative of the purchaser, and, in the event of their failure to agree, by a third person selected by these two, whose decision shall be final and binding on both parties.

ART. 7. Contract price: (1) The contract price for copper in usual commercial shapes is hereby fixed at the monthly average New York price for electrolytic copper, as quoted by the Engineering and Mining Journal (published in New York).

(3) The contract price for the copper content of the scrap copper is hereby fixed at the monthly average New York price for electrolytic copper, as quoted by the Engineering and Mining Journal (published in New York), less 1¼ cents per pound.

In the event that no average monthly price shall be fixed by said Journal for any month during the currency of this contract, the contract price for such month shall be fixed by agreement between a duly authorized representative of the contracting officer and a duly authorized representative of the purchaser, and, in the event of their failure to agree, by a third person selected by these two, whose decision shall be final and binding on both parties.

The contract price for the various shapes and grades of the copper shall be determined on the 5th day of May and on the 5th day of each succeeding month during the currency of this contract.

The contract price determined as above shall apply to all copper and copper scrap which the purchaser has agreed to receive and pay for during the preceding month.

The United States shall allow the purchaser a deduction of 1 per cent of the contract price upon all copper and copper scrap delivered and taken hereunder to cover all necessary expenses in connection with the sale of said material, including storage, unloading, freight charges to the plants of the purchaser's vendees, weighing and assaying charges, and all other incidental expenses, including superintendence, but excluding deductions referred to in subparagraphs 2 and 3 of this article 7.

The contract price shall be paid by the purchaser to the United States in gold or its equivalent at Washington, D. C., or other points indicated by the United States on or before the 15th day of the second month for each month's quota as heretofore specified.

ART. 8. General provisions: The purchaser shall from time to time, and whenever so requested, furnish to the contracting officer statements and reports on the progress of the performance of this contract and full information of all factors relating to performance hereunder. The purchaser agrees at all times to do all things necessary to protect and conserve the best interests of the United States.

ART. 9. Causes beyond the control of the purchaser and the United States: Neither party shall be held responsible for or be deemed to be in default hereunder by reason of delays in performance of this contract due to strikes, transportation embargoes, fires, explosion, riots, acts of God, or other causes beyond their control.

ART. 10. Use of copper by United States: Upon notice in writing from the contracting officer to the purchaser the United States may for its own purposes, but not for resale, use any of the copper herein contracted for prior to the resale thereof by the purchaser.

ART. 11. Officials not to benefit: No Member of or Delegate to Congress or Resident Commissioner is or shall be admitted to any share or part of this contract or to any benefit that may arise therefrom, but this article shall not apply to this contract so far as it may be within the operations or exceptions of section 116 of the act of Congress approved March 4, 1909 (35 Stat., 1109).

ART. 13. Notice: Any notice to the purchaser under this contract when not actually delivered in writing to the purchaser shall be deemed to have been sufficiently given when mailed in a sealed postpaid wrapper addressed to the purchaser at 42 Broadway, New York, N. Y. Any notice to the United States under this contract, when not actualy delivered in writing to the contracting officer, shall be deemed to have been sufficiently given when mailed in a sealed postpaid wrapper addressed to the director of sales, War Department, Washington, D. C.

ART. 14. Bond: The purchaser shall furnish to the United States within 20 days after the execution and delivery of this agreement a bond in the sum of $1,000,000, conditioned upon the full and faithful performance by the purchaser of all terms, covenants, and conditions of this contract on the part of the purchaser to be performed. Such bond shall be in the form and with sureties satisfactory to the contracting officer. Unless such bond is furnished within the time limit this agreement may, at the option of the contracting officer, be canceled.

ART. 15. Adjustment of claims and disputes: Except as otherwise specifically provided in this contract, any claims, doubts, or disputes which may arise under this contract, or as to its performance or nonperformance, may be determined upon petition of the party hereto by the Secretary of War. The decision of the Secretary of War shall be final and conclusive on all matters submitted for determination.

ART. 16. Definitions: Contracting officer: The officer in whose name this contract is executed, his successor or successors, or anyone from time to time designated by the Director of Purchase, Storage and Traffic to act as contracting officer, and his or their duly authorized agent or agents who may be specifically delegated to perform the various functions herein attributed to the contracting officer.

The purchaser: The party of the second part, its legal representatives and successors.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I went into this question the other day, and I ask the committee to read that copper contract carefully and see if it does not give absolute power to the copper monopoly in this country to dispose of this copper as they see fit. The contract speaks for itself. Besides making a profit at the time these copper people sold this copper to the United States, they are now to receive a commission for reselling this copper in such manner as will not disturb the prices that they fixed. Not only to prevent a disturbance of the market. Get the difference between the two. The purpose does not seem to be to prevent dumping on the market and disturbing the market, but rather to maintain the margin of profit fixed by the people who control the copper and still retain control. I believe that a happy medium could have been found.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for order.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, this is only a matter of a million dollars, I will say to the gentleman. Never mind the order.

On the lumber which we have for sale the lumber people were called in conference, and they are selling the lumber on a commission of 12 per cent.

Now, I want to point out to the committee that these commissions—12 per cent here and 3 per cent there—given to the agency which actually disposes of these surplus supplies do not come out of this $1,000,000. They come out of the proceeds of the sales, and this $1,000,000 is the overhead charge for the luxury of having this board of experts in Washington.

Now, I agree that the Government should get the best available price without disturbing the market for surplus supplies, but I am certain that the officers now in the various departments, who actually get the customers, who actually get the prices, can continue to do so, can be formed into a joint board among themselves, and that we can easily save $700,000 on this item alone.

It does not take a trip to Europe of these three men to find out what the condition of the market is. We have committees there; we have a liquidating commission there now, which has sold millions of dollars' worth of surplus supplies of the American Expeditionary Forces to France and to neutral countries. Everyone knows the condition of the market there. Lumber will sell itself. If we can get the lumber there, it will sell itself. We do not need to spend a lot of time and money for this extra joy trip to Europe. This has nothing to do with getting the boys home. Let us understand that. This has nothing to do with the military policy or with the reorganization scheme. This is purely an appropriation in a lump sum of money to increase by $900,000 over the amount provided for in the bill last year, over which we have no control, to be spent on the testimony given by the director of this office on salaries ranging from $25,000 to $6,000, and where more help is to be employed. If you will examine the testimony, you will see that this bureau does not exercise the function of directing the sales. It acts purely in an advisory capacity. The actual sales are made by officers in the United States Army, patriotic men who entered the service and are ready to see the war through without asking salaries of $25,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman will admit, however, that all sales made by the bureaus of the department before being completed must be submitted to the central board.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. All sales over $100,000.

Mr. MADDEN. They have control of the coordination of the whole situation and stabilizing the sales, and thereby saving the Government a lot of money.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the gentleman will read the testimony, it has not worked out that way.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will yield.

Mr. KAHN. My recollection is that Mr. Hare testified that some few transactions that he has had have already got better prices for commodities through his intercession and saved the Government to the extent of $4,000,000.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Can the gentleman from California give us some of the articles?

Mr. KAHN. I can not recollect; I have not had an opportunity to go into the details of the hearings, but I think he made that statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I ask for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. KAHN. On pages 410 and 411 of the hearings the director of sales gives a number of items of raw material where increased prices were received by the Government through his activity.

Then he says:

So you see by following that intensive method it has resulted in the saving of $4,000,000, or in getting an increased price to that amount over and above what the bureau had originally intended to accept.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; those figures were read, but there was nothing before the committee which showed what the offers were submitted to this bureau. This is mostly on metal, and this metal was not sold through the efforts of the director of sales, but simply put into the hands of the copper people. It was along these lines that the director of sales testified. He did not point to anything concrete. There was some testimony about a saving of $10,000,000 by the Ordnance Department, but when cross-examined by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WISE], on page 415, he says:

You disapprove entirely the appropriation asked for for cleaning and repairing?

Mr. HARE. No; I do not, because I am not familiar enough with the details of the appropriation.

Now, I want that to go into the RECORD, because there will be some statements made about this mysterious $10,000,000. But he did not know what the Ordnance Department was talking about.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Is it fair to speak of this as "a mysterious $10,000,000"? Anybody who knows anything about machinery knows that when you lay it up you have to grease it, clean it, put it in a position where it will not deteriorate, and if it takes $10,000,000 to do that with the machinery, guns, and equipment that the Ordnance Department has, that is what it takes, and it ought to be done.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly, and the Ordnance Department knows what it is talking about. I agree with what the gentleman has said; but here is a man who says he does not know what they are talking about, and that is the point I desire to make.

Mr. MADDEN. He was acting as a salesman, not as a mechanic.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. MCKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute amendment for that of the gentleman from New York, and that is to substitute $500,000 for $300,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment in the nature of a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the amendment of Mr. LAGUARDIA by Mr. MCKENZIE: Strike out $300,000 and insert in lieu thereof $500,000.

Mr. MCKENZIE. Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, if you will give me your attention for a few moments I will endeavor to explain the reason for offering this amendment. In the first place, this whole discussion applying to the language written in the bill is not consistent. What the War Department asked with additional language by adding to the first paragraph of the bill would make the appropriation and the language agree. The fact is that in the last bill presented to this House we agreed to give them $100,000. The War Department asked for $200,000 to cover incidental expenses. A few days ago the Secretary of War appeared before our committee and said he would like to have us amend that and give them $1,000,000, and his reason for asking that amount was, as he stated, that in France we have what is known as the United States Liquidation Bureau, an organization to dispose of property in France, and that in this country Assistant Secretary Crowell had built up in the War Department what was known as the director of sales department, with Mr. Hare at the head of that organization.

It was further testified that the probable expense of paying the personnel of the experts and others employed under Mr. Hare would be $250,000. The Secretary of War in asking for $1,000,000 stated—and this was in the hearings—that the whole amount was speculative and that no one could tell whether a million dollars would be sufficient to pay the entire expenses or not. With that statement of the Secretary of War I fully agree. It was testified to before our committee that in the Ordnance Department they have a sales organization, men picked out for the purpose, who are now putting the property of the Ordnance Department on the market and selling it. In the Quartermaster Department they have the same thing, and the other different departments of the Military Establishment they have their sales organizations. Now, Mr. Hare and his experts, with their enormous salaries—and I am not saying that they are being paid too much—simply direct and lay down rules of instruction to these men in the Ordnance, the Quartermaster, and the other departments how to make sales, and they report back to this director of sales, and it is a sort of clearing house for all of the sales made in the different bureaus of the War Department.

It was testified to and it is in the hearings that they have made a contract with a lumber concern for the sale of lumber in which they are to pay these men about 12 per cent for handling the surplus lumber that we have in the War Department. They have made arrangements with the copper dealers to feed out to the public the surplus copper we have in the War Department, and to pay them a commission for so doing. I am not criticizing the business end of that proposition, because they argue that it is to stabilize business, and they argue also that in controlling the enormous amount of meat supplies—and I shall put into the RECORD as a part of my statement the number of pounds of meat that we have—they are putting them out at the suggestion of the men interested in the meat concerns of the country in a way that will not disturb the labor in these great packing industries of our country. I might be perfectly willing to agree with them on that proposition if it were not for the further fact that in my judgment if these hundreds of millions of pounds of meat and other food supplies were put upon the market at a little less price than the public is paying to-day the increased consumption of the people of the country of meats would keep the packing houses of the country busy in the packing industry, and it would not affect labor at all. [Applause.] That is my individual judgment about the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MCKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MCKENZIE. I have not the time nor the desire to go into a critical analysis of this proposition, but I want to say to the members of this committee that if we give these men $500,000, that is a big sum with which to pay for their overhead organization, the experts, who simply direct the sale of the surplus stock that we have, and if it proves to be not a sufficient amount and they come back to Congress showing that they have done the country a service there will be no difficulty about getting a deficiency bill through to pay for the balance. But I say to you, and I say to the country, the time has come when it is your duty and it is my duty to cut out every man we can cut out of these special organizations that have been created to carry on the business of this country—outside and above the regular organizations that have been provided for by law. These special organizations have given employment to thousands of men under the guise of serving our country as patriots and business men. I hope they have done it.

Mr. BOIES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. BOIES. Why does the gentleman ask for an increase to $500,000 when he says that salaries amount to only $250,000?

Mr. MCKENZIE. I will say to my friend that the $250,000 applies only to the sales organizations in this country. In France the liquidation commission which we have over there also has an overhead organization, which must be paid.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman is aware of the fact that the liquidation commission is not paid out of this fund.

Mr. MCKENZIE. If the gentleman will read the testimony——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The French liquidation commission is not paid out of this.

Mr. MCKENZIE. But they are going to make a sales organization out of that, I understand.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. HAUGEN. What disposition is made of surplus automobiles?

Mr. MCKENZIE. I regret to say to the gentleman from Iowa that up to this time there has been really no disposition of automobiles, except those that have been sent out into the Department of Agriculture and the Post Office Department, and I assume that if the gentleman will investigate the Department of Agriculture he will find some of them down there.

Mr. HAUGEN. But the fact is that millions of dollars are going to waste every day, and no effort is being made to dispose of surplus automobiles or trucks or any other of the supplies of the department, and as every day goes by millions of dollars go to waste. Here we have great departments, and we are spending money every day without results, without a single effort being made to dispose of a single thing.

Mr. MCKENZIE. I want to say to the gentleman that I would be very glad indeed to see some steps taken to sell the surplus automobiles and trucks in this country, but I realize this fact, that that ought to be handled, of course, with some business judgment, and under the plan laid down by this sales director and this organization they would make an arrangement with the manufacturers of automobiles and trucks and feed these automobiles out as the public could take them without disturbing the trade.

Mr. HAUGEN. It has been hinted that the arrangement made places them beyond the reach of the average man; that the contracts are put up in such shape that the average man can not take advantage of them.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I have been reliably informed that they are selling automobiles, the Ford machine—I do not know whether you call it an automobile or not——

Mr. McKENZIE. A car.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. The Ford cars over in France at $75 a car and that the Cadillac is being sold at five or six hundred dollars each. I wonder if the gentleman has any information on that?

Mr. McKENZIE. I have no information on that.

Mr. ANTHONY. I can say, if the gentleman will permit, that the French Government has interdicted the sale of surplus Ford cars in France at any price, and instead of getting them for $75 people will pay $1,200 if the French would only permit them to buy them. Instead of it being true that Cadillacs are sold at $500 or $600 the authorities in France have offers from Spain of $6,000 for Cadillac limousines for which proper customs arrangements must be made with the Spanish Government. So far they have been unable to make them.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. I am glad to hear that because there is a report they are being sold at those prices.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be granted such time as he may desire—five minutes. I believe this matter is of sufficient importance for him to have that time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question? I have read in the newspapers there was an arrangement by which trucks are allotted to the various States and the States in turn have allotted those trucks for use in road work. I have seen those items in the papers. Has the gentleman any information as to the allotment of trucks to the various States?

Mr. McKENZIE. That was the statement made before our committee and you will find it in the hearing. That is one of the plans. I can not say how many have been allotted.

Mr. HAMILTON. I wanted to know if it is true that is being done.

Mr. McKENZIE. That is one of their plans.

Mr. HAMILTON. Is it actually being operated?

Mr. McKENZIE. Well, I can not say as to that, but they contemplate it.

Mr. HAMILTON. They contemplate it?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. I will.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I have had correspondence with the Quartermaster General of the War Department in reference to the disposition of trucks. He referred me to a party in the Agricultural Department, to whom the distribution had been committed. I received a letter from this party stating that these trucks would be turned over to the road commissioners of the different States and through the road commissioners distributed to the different counties and municipalities who are engaged in building hard-surface roads. He did not say how many.

Mr. ROMJUE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri a question. Did the gentleman understand that those trucks were to be allotted to the States and then by the States put in the hands of the road commissioners?

Mr. ALEXANDER. They are by the Agricultural Department delivered to the road commissioners of the different States and through the road commissioners are allotted to the different counties and municipalities. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS] tells me that they have already been distributed in Kentucky.

Mr. FIELDS. I understand there was a distribution made about a week ago at Covington, Ky.

Mr. McKENZIE. If the gentleman will permit me to read I can clear this matter up in a moment. I read from the hearings:

The CHAIRMAN. In regard to motor vehicles, can you give the committee any plan by which you intend to sell your motor vehicles?

Mr. HARE. I can, sir. Under an act we are transferring now, as rapidly as the Department of Agriculture can take them, our surplus trucks. We have about 30,000 carried as surplus, and we intend to deliver 20,000 to the Department of Agriculture, they, in turn, to ship them to the States for their road-building requirements. We are turning over a good many of the other trucks, free of charge, to the Post Office Department, and the small surplus—I doubt very much if in the end we have more than perhaps 2,000 trucks for sale, and those will be offered to the highest bidders. In regard to motor vehicles, the Army has declared no surplus whatever on new cars. It has not, to date, declared any surplus on used cars, but will, very shortly, have comparatively large numbers of used cars in all states of repair, which will be offered at public auction or to the highest bidder.

Mr. HAMILTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama, who has been on his feet

Mr. BANKHEAD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question in order to get some light on this particular item we are considering, the appropriation of $1,000,000. Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] stated that the current appropriation for this fiscal year for this item was $100,000, and the gentleman stated that some one requested that it be increased to $1,000,000. I want to ask the gentleman if this particular department that is expending this money got along during the present fiscal year on the appropriation of $100,000.

Mr. McKENZIE. I will say to the gentleman from Alabama that he has a misunderstanding of the facts. The $100,000 was the amount that we carried in the bill recently passed by this House which failed in the Senate in the last Congress.

Mr. BANKHEAD. How much was the estimate upon which that appropriation was based?

Mr. McKENZIE. Two hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. BANKHEAD. By the War Department?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is it contemplated to increase the number of employees, the personnel of this particular organization, after July 1, 1919?

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman permit——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Let us have an answer on that; we are seeking information.

Mr. McKENZIE. I am trying to give it, if I am able. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say to the gentleman at the time we made the last appropriation there was not one cent asked by the bureau for which we want to appropriate $1,000,000 to-day.

Mr. SABATH. It was not in existence?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. McKENZIE. May I have one minute?

Mr. HAUGEN. I ask that the gentleman be given five minutes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire an extension of time?

Mr. HAMILTON. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMILTON. I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois what understanding has he as to what the Federal Government is to receive for these trucks apportioned among the various States; that is to say, whether the States pay anything for them or whether it simply involves the use of the trucks?

Mr. McKENZIE. In my judgment it would simply be a case of bookkeeping. They would be transferred from the War Department to the Federal Road Construction Department or the Department of Agriculture, and would be charged on the books against those various departments and credited to the War Department.

Mr. KAHN. Regarding the trucks, of course, the Department of Agriculture, receiving the trucks, would make regulations for turning them over to the States. It would not be a War Department matter. It would be a matter for the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. HAMILTON. Still there is one question that is not completely cleared up. Do the States pay for the use of the trucks?

Mr. McKENZIE. I do not know, I will say to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HAMILTON. They are simply worn out, without any compensation anywhere?

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman is giving information as to the disposition of the trucks. There is a surplus of 2,000 of them. How are they to be disposed of? Are they to be disposed of in the same way as the aeroplanes are to be disposed of; that is, practically given away?

Mr. McKENZIE. The testimony was that they would be sold at public auction to the highest bidder.

Mr. HAUGEN. All of the 2,000?

Mr. McKENZIE. I can not say as to that.

Mr. HAUGEN. What information can the gentleman give as to the disposition of automobiles?

Mr. McKENZIE. I can not give you anything further than what we have in the hearings. They have not disposed of them as yet. It was stated, I believe, that some man had sold a certain number of Dodge cars at a very low price; that it was a fraudulent transaction. He was arrested and tried and convicted, I understand.

Mr. HAUGEN. My information is, and I get it from the office, that not a car has been sold. They are distibuting them among the States. Why are the States entitled to these machines?

Mr. McCULLOCH. I would like to secure some information from the gentleman from Illinois if possible. This item to me presents a rather peculiar and interesting situation. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], a member of the committee, says $300,000 is the amount; the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] says it takes $500,000; and the War Department says $1,000,000. Can the gentleman give the House the estimates that were made by the War Department and which led the committee to ask for $1,000,000?

Mr. McKENZIE. If you take the hearings there and read the testimony of the Secretary of War, on page 257, I think it is——

Mr. McCULLOCH. Is the gentleman familiar enough with it to give it to the House? I have not been able to read the hearings.

Mr. McKENZIE. I can only reiterate what I have already said, that he wanted this money to pay the personnel of this division or this organization, which he believed was serving a good purpose, and that $1,000,000 was only a speculative amount; that no one could determine just how much it should be.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Will the gentleman yield further? On what basis, then, does the gentleman reduce it $500,000?

Mr. McKENZIE. I will simply say to the gentleman from Ohio that my experience as a legislator has been that estimates are very seldom, if ever, made below the amount required, but very frequently made higher than are necessary. I feel that that is true in regard to this estimate. And I feel that as a man responsible for making the appropriation that I have just as much right to make a guess at the amount, after studying the question, as has the Secretary of War, and the responsibility is on the Members of this House to appropriate this money. And if we appropriate $500,000 they might be compelled to cut down their organization to some extent. But the fact that they had to cut it down in numbers would not necessarily mean cutting it down in efficiency, in my judgment.

Mr. McCULLOCH. In other words, we have the last guess here.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I hope he is keeping in mind, in making the estimate of $500,000 to cover this item, "Contingencies of the Army," that the item "Contingencies of the Army" is not confined by any means in its scope to this sales commission. It provides for everything in the Army that relates to just exactly that very vague and indefinite sphere "contingencies," and only a part of it is to be devoted to this sales business that has taken up all the time of the committee.

Mr. McKENZIE. My recollection is that in peace time we appropriated $25,000 to take care of those other items.

The statistics respecting food supplies heretofore referred to are as follows:

MAY 23, 1919.

The War Department authorizes publication of the following statement from the office of the Director of Sales, showing estimated surplus meat products on hand in the United States:

Meat.	Container.	Pounds on hand.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I hope that neither the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] nor the substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] will prevail. I think the majority of the committee decided, after hearing the Secretary of War and after hearing Mr. Hare, that the creation of this sales bureau offered the best possible plan of disposing of about $1,500,000,000 worth of surplus property that the Government ought to turn into cash as quickly as it can economically and safely be done. The committee was confronted by estimates from all the different bureaus of the War Department asking for sums as high as $10,000,000, for instance, from the Ordnance Bureau, for sales purposes. There was one item of $10,000,000 for the preparation of machinery to pack it and grease it and fit it for sale on the market. Mr. Hare told us that, in his opinion, by the creation of this central sales bureau he would be able to undertake the work of selling the surplus material in all these bureaus. For one, I am convinced that he has the business ability and the organization requisite to do it. In reply to my question when he appeared before the committee, as to whether he thought, for instance, that the appropriation of $10,000,000 asked for by the Ordnance Department to sell its surplus machines was necessary, he said, "No; I believe I can sell those machines where they stand."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman does not desire to make a misstatement of facts?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; I certainly do not desire to make a misstatement of facts.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman from Kansas have the kindness to read the testimony on page 415, when the question was put—

You disapprove entirely the appropriation asked for for cleaning and repairing?

And the answer on page 416 was—

No; I do not; because I am not familiar enough with the details of the appropriation.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let me say to the gentleman that if he will look on page 415 he will bear out my statement. I think I am able to read the English language. I asked Mr. Hare the question:

Mr. ANTHONY. I think it was $8,000,000 for the purpose of greasing and packing certain machine tools now in possession of the Ordnance Department. I am corrected on that and told it was $10,000,000. When you begin to sell that class of material your cost of sale is going to run higher?

Mr. HARE. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will such sales of the Ordnance Department come under your supervision?

Mr. HARE. Yes; they will come under our supervision. In regard to that item for repair work which is being done, I believe we can sell these machines to-day without a penny being spent on them.

Now, I do not care to go into it any further.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But the gentleman should state the facts correctly.

Mr. ANTHONY. I believe Mr. Hare will be able to sell that surplus ordnance machinery without the expenditure of this $10,000,000 which the Ordnance Bureau asks. I want to give him the money at least to make an effort. He has shown that he has already saved about $4,000,000 in selling metals and other material, much of it belonging to the Ordnance Department. He has stepped in and has saved this money and I want to give Mr. Hare a chance. We are making this item of contingent expenses large enough to provide eight hundred and odd thousand dollars necessary for the operations of this bureau.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. All I wanted to suggest to my friend is that a part of this money asked for by the Ordnance Department is to be used for slushing machinery and tools, and so forth, to carry out a regular program which they would follow with respect to these machines, whether they were sold or not. A large part of such stores is always put away in that way. It takes thousands of dollars to do it every year.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the gentleman is correct and I am in error, that the Director of Sales can dispose of these machines without spending the $10,000,000 which the Ordnance Department says is necessary to spend if they sell them, will the gentleman agree to take $10,000,000 off the amount allowed to the Ordnance Department?

Mr. ANTHONY. We have deducted it. We have made savings in every bureau, and we have put what we consider an adequate amount under contingencies to permit the organization of this Sales Bureau to take the place of these larger expenditures.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman from Kansas be allowed to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Kansas be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman's statement places the War Department in a very embarrassing position. I infer from what the gentleman has stated that the integrity and the business ability of the War Department can not be relied upon, and that it is necessary now to spend $1,000,000 to let some competent people do it.

Mr. ANTHONY. No. The men at the head of the different bureaus of the War Department are largely soldiers, and they are good soldiers and good men, but they are not keen, shrewd business men. We propose to supply this Bureau of Sales with men like Mr. Hare at the head of it, keen business men, who can handle this business to the advantage of the Government.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. McCULLOCH. The gentleman mentioned the figure as something like eight hundred and some odd thousand dollars as the probable expense?

Mr. ANTHONY. That was stated to be the probable cost.

Mr. McCULLOCH. What are the items that entered into it? If we assume that these men are good business men, are they good enough business men to give the committee and the House an estimate of what it is going to cost to do this thing? Are we going to be forced to guess at it?

Mr. ANTHONY. No. Nobody can tell us just what the cost will be.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Have they made any estimate of the probable cost?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; nothing more than what I have stated.

Mr. McCULLOCH. The gentleman reflects on the business ability of the Army officers by such a statement.

Mr. ANTHONY. No; I do not reflect upon them at all. The chairman of our committee informs me that they estimate it will cost about $1,000,000.

Mr. McCULLOCH. What figures enter into it? I would like to get some information about it. I am willing to vote millions for it if it is necessary and proper.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the items which go into it, as I recall, are salaries and a great amount of printing, and the sending out of hundreds of thousands of letters to buyers all over the world, the collection of data affecting the markets of the world, and matters of that kind.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me just a moment more?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. McCULLOCH. The gentleman has been speaking in generalities, and the gentleman from Illinois used generalities. Is there any budget or any estimate given that can be put into the RECORD justifying Congress in accepting this recommendation of a million dollars for this purpose?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. There is not.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Then I think the committee ought to recall some one and get the necessary information.

Mr. ANTHONY. We had an estimate of $10,000,000 from one bureau for sales operations alone.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. And it is no more reliable than the estimates before the committee now.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is impossible in such a matter to estimate accurately.

Mr. JEFFERIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. JEFFERIS. Did Mr. Hare attempt to give any information as to what this bureau would require?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; the idea was that a million dollars is to be employed to cover the operations of the bureau, and in view of the fact that some of the estimates run up beyond $10,000,000, we prefer to give Mr. Hare's bureau the opportunity to administer it.

Mr. JEFFERIS. I was trying to find out whether the estimate of a million dollars comes from the Secretary of War or does it come from Mr. Hare?

Mr. ANTHONY. It comes from the Secretary of War.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. I have been listening with very great interest to this discussion regarding this appropriation for a new commission to stabilize prices. I am very much in sympathy with that kind of a proposition, but I would like also to have the question answered, Who are these gentlemen, these so-called business experts, that command salaries of $25,000, $10,000, and $6,000 every year? A very good definition of an expert is a fellow that is away from home telling the other fellow how to do it. [Laughter.]

Now, one more statement. I would like to have this Congress spend some money to stabilize the prices downward for the consumer, as well as prices upward for the producer. Here we are asked to appropriate $1,000,000 to stabilize prices for the producer.

Mr. ANTHONY. Oh, no.

Mr. BEGG. That is my conception, to keep the prices from falling.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let me say to the gentleman that that is not the object of the appropriation. The object of the appropriation is to convert these surplus supplies into money and put that money into the Treasury of the United States. Of course, in doing that we do not want to entirely disorganize the markets of the country.

Mr. BEGG. All right. Has this Congress ever appropriated one single dollar during the war when we were buying everywhere, helter skelter—did we ever provide one dollar to keep prices from going up? I know, and you know, and every other man knows that prices in every line are abnormal.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that debate on this amendment has been exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama makes the point of order that debate on the amendment has been exhausted, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Is the time limited on this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, what are we to vote on?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. McKENZIE to the amendment of Mr. LaGUARDIA: Strike out $300,000 and insert $500,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment as amended.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, is an amendment now in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I move to strike out the "$500,000" and insert "$250,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to amend, and the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "$500,000" and insert "$250,000."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the most important question before the people of the United States to-day is the cost of living, and I can not see a more important subject to receive the attention of the House at this moment than the question of this appropriation so that the people of the country may be illumined as to the reason why the United States Government refuses to sell $60,000,000 worth of products that the people want. Mr. Hare, who is the representative of the Government at the present time, according to the report which is before the Members of the House, makes this extraordinary statement:

On account of the inaccessibility of the warehouses where this food is stored, however, it is doubtful whether any considerable portion of the public will come to a sale if carried out.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that this is a most extraordinary statement. I think I am within the bounds of truth when I say that there are millions of Americans who go to bed every night hungry because they can not get proper food on account of the high cost of living everywhere in the United States.

We are appealed to, and properly so, by hundreds of thousands of Government employees who have seen the cost of living increase 100 per cent within the past four years, while their wages have increased on an average 20 per cent. And yet the Government controls this immense amount of food products, has controlled it since the armistice was signed six months ago, and because it may occasion a glut on the market which would lower the price of beef across the water, or because of the manner in which the warehouses of the country are distributed throughout the United States, the people can not have this beef. And I say to you that this is a situation which we can not dodge. People are hungry in every part of the United States because they can not afford to pay the price for beef, and it is a crime if the Government at Washington can not organize its brains to put this meat where the people can get it and relieve their hungry stomachs.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. In 1912 the Democratic Party was going to reduce the cost of living. Is this an indictment or a confession that they have not made good?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Democratic Party is not responsible for this situation. As the ex-Speaker of the House eloquently portrayed it a few moments ago upon the floor of the House, under the leadership of the Democratic Party the American Army won the greatest victory that the world has ever known. [Applause.] It did it without a suspicion of graft on the part of anybody connected with the administration.

I was here in the Spanish-American War. At that time I was the lone Democratic Representative from the six New England States when that war was fought, and, as the ex-Speaker said, there were charges of graft and they were proven. We heard about embalmed canned beef being fed to the soldiers, and it was proven that it was, though that was an infant war compared to the world conflagration when the United States was called into it as a matter of honor to rescue civilization and humanity. And under the leadership of the Democratic Party and of Woodrow Wilson the United States did it, Mr. Chairman. [Applause.] In this condition of affairs now I am not speaking as a Democrat to Democrats or to the Republican membership of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will ask unanimous consent that my time be extended two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that his time be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The men who were in charge of these supplies have been brought in, as other Members of the House have stated—experts. There are experts when the Republicans are in power; there are experts when the Democrats are in power, and they go with the party in power to prey upon the public of the United States. It is not the Republican Party that is responsible or the Democratic Party that is responsible, unless we fail to rise to our responsibilities in this hour. The other day in New York I spoke to Mr. Barnes and attempted to get some information about flour. I attempted to get some information from the Bureau of Agriculture and from the Food Administration in Washington about flour. They said that the Food Administration was in New York City. I said, "Is not the seat of government here in Washington?" They said, "Yes; but the Food Administration is in New York, and if you want information in regard to the price of wheat and as to whether flour is to be continued at its present price or not, you must go to Mr. Barnes in New York." So I got on the train and took a journey of six hours and went over to New York and went into Mr. Barnes's office, and I said to Mr. Barnes, "What is the condition of the wheat crop? Are we to have $16 flour while it is being sold for $10 in England?" He said, "England takes the loss." I said, "Mr. Barnes, I think the United States should take the loss. Wheat is the staff of life. It is fundamental to the welfare of the people of the country. Every day there are strikes for more wages. Why? Because people can not live because of the cost of living. You must cut down the price of flour and let the Government take the loss if you want the business of this country to proceed along normal lines." But he said he did not believe in that policy. He was the Government, and, though I was elected a Representative, there was nothing else I could do but get out, come back to Washington, and make my protest here on the floor of this House.

Great Britain is fighting the American Beef Trust and will drive it out if it can. To-day's papers report the organization of another beef combination, and among its principal officials are men who have been dictating the world's prices of beef products for the Food Administration. A leopard can not change his spots; neither can these men change their point of view on what constitutes reasonable profits, and as long as they continue in charge the American people are bound to suffer.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, this matter of the sales of the surplus supplies is an exceedingly important one. No business institution in this country, without calling upon the great banking houses, could carry through a proposition involving the sale of $1,600,000,000 worth of supplies.

There is no politics about this thing. The question is, Can we sell the goods to the best possible advantage for the Government, having a due regard for the business interests and the working people of the country.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD] told us about bringing the meat to the people of the country. Let me tell him that right in his city of Boston there are hundreds of retail grocers and small business men who have three or four thousand dollars invested in the stocks of goods on their shelves. They are making a living for themselves and their families selling ordinary canned goods put out on the market.

Mr. LAYTON. May I interrupt the gentleman?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Delaware?

Mr. KAHN. I will yield in just a minute. When you dump on the market great quantities of supplies you break the market, and the small dealer is the loser just the same as the big dealer.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. I admit that proposition, but compared with the millions of people in the United States whose stomachs are being broken it is insignificant, and I think it is pretty nearly time that, regardless of politics, this one question of food supplies, which lies at the basis of the employment of labor and wages, should be taken up and met fearlessly even if there is a break on the part of a few grocers or packers in Chicago. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. There will be no break. As a matter of fact, the meat that is packed for the Army is not put up in such packages as the buying public is accustomed to. The bacon which they have on hand is put up in an entirely different way than the ordinary bacon that the consumers of the country are accustomed to. You have to get special buyers for these goods. I am told that it is salted for 23 days and then smoked for 8 days.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The soldiers were going to eat it.

Mr. KAHN. It was prepared especially for them.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And it was excellent.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOIES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I asked that very question of the sales commissioner about that bacon. I pointed out the fact that the soldiers were called upon to eat it. He remarked that it was prepared in a special way, that it is good bacon, but that the public does not buy it readily, prepared as it is, without instruction as to how to prepare and cook it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. No; I can not yield just now. As a matter of fact, the sales department has already sold materials that cost our Government $325,000,000 and have recovered $279,000,000, which is a loss of 14 per cent. We were told that the prices that were offered by the purchasers at first were materially lower than the prices that were finally secured. In other words, they succeeded——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman fom California has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KAHN. In other words, the sales managers have already saved the Government millions of dollars more than they are asking us to allow them to make these sales to the buyers of the world.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; I yield to my colleague on the committee.

Mr. DENT. Is it not a fact that by consolidating this million-dollar appropriation under this item in the head of the director of sales we are saving many more millions that would absolutely have to be expended by the Ordnance Department, by the Quartermaster Department, by the Signal Corps, and every other branch of the service?

Mr. KAHN. That is the idea, exactly, and I thank the gentleman for his statement. As a matter of fact, if we do not have this one consolidated division, that will dispose of these commodities, the very condition that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] refers to would exist. These separate bureaus of the War Department and other departments would be called upon to engage in the business of selling their surplus stocks.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I can not yield now. As was pointed out by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY], the heads of the bureaus of the War Department are soldiers. They are not business men. They do not know the buying public. They do not know the men who require these great quantities of supplies.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. The supplies include everything from a safety pin to a locomotive crane. There are hundreds of articles embraced in the list. It is no mere matter of going out to a street corner and trying to sell to any business man who is passing in the crowd. It requires a systematic method, a long effort, to secure the purchasers for these goods.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. We have a system in this country now already in working operation that ramifies into every crossroads of the United States—the Post Office Department, with its parcels post.

Mr. KAHN. Can you send a locomotive crane through the post office?

Mr. LAYTON. I am not talking about that.

Mr. KAHN. Well, that is one of the items for sale.

Mr. LAYTON. I am talking about one thing; I am not talking about all things. In the matter of food supplies—take the canned goods, for instance—that are stored up all over the country.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I simply yielded for a question.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman seems to think that the only question involved here is the sale of foodstuffs. That is only an incident. There are hundreds of items, as I stated; there are some hundreds of locomotive cranes; there are railroad cars, acids, chemicals, raw materials, scrap, and all kinds of materials to be sold.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I am sure that my distinguished colleague does not want to have it appear in the RECORD that any misstatement as to testimony before our committee has been made. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] interrogated the gentleman a few moments ago and asked if this sales department would not take the place of all the other departments in the Military Establishment. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that the testimony discloses the statement from Mr. Hare that, so far as making the actual sales is concerned, they have nothing to do with it, that they will be carried out by the different organizations, but the sales department would direct, lay the plans, and perhaps pass finally upon the consummation of the sale?

Mr. KAHN. If my colleague will permit me, my recollection is that this sales department will negotiate sales, will secure the prices, and then finally the various bureaus will deliver the goods when the sale is made.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. KAHN. I ask for five minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What is the matter now before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I make the point of order that debate on that amendment has been exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Let the amendment be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Is it in order now to offer an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. McCULLOCH. An amendment to the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. That would be an amendment in the third degree. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

There was no objection.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is it in order now for me to offer a substitute for the amendment to my amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York may offer a substitute.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I therefore move as a substitute to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts to my amendment to read "$300,000" instead of "$250,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman from New York offered originally an amendment to reduce the amount to $300,000 and the gentleman from Illinois offered an amendment to that to make the amount $500,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to offer an amendment. Now, is this the proper time to do it? I ask the Chair that question by way of a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. A substitute would be in order; an amendment is not in order.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. If a substitute is in order, why was my substitute declared out of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offered an original amendment which has been amended by the vote of the committee.

Mr. McCULLOCH. I desire to offer a substitute——

The CHAIRMAN. The original amendment is the amendment which the gentleman from New York now offers.

Mr. McCULLOCH. I desire to offer a substitute. I move to strike out the "$250,000" contained in the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a substitute. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Division.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment as amended.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman, is an amendment to the amendment now in order? If it is I desire to offer one.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment is in order if it is a proper amendment.

Mr. McCULLOCH. I move to strike out the "$500,000" contained in the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois. That would leave no appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not an amendment; that is striking out the action of the committee just taken. The question is on the amendment as amended.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, the greater part of the money spent for carrying on the war was expended for supplies, munitions, food, clothing, and the other things that soldiers need. After the armistice was signed the War Department continued to receive from the contractors large quantities of these supplies and materials aggregating, as I am informed, some $2,000,000,000. Much is still on hand that was received since November 11, 1918, and much which was on hand prior to that time remains undisposed of.

A great deal has been said in the newspapers and by the public on the subject of the disposition of these surplus supplies. Much public criticism has been made of the way in which it is being sold. The confidence of the plain people of this country is shaken in the ability and willingness of the War Department, through its agents, to realize for the Government a fair return for this surplus. It is being openly charged that no effort is being made in good faith to realize the greatest possible amount for the Government. It is being charged that this surplus is being disposed of, not with the view to giving the people who want to buy it a fair opportunity to do so, and thereby getting the most money possible out of it for the Government, but with the sole view to protecting those who might be in competition with the sale of it. [Applause.] I believe that I am safe in saying that the average man in this country believes that much of this surplus is being withheld from the markets with the sole purpose of protecting the packers and food producers and dealers and manufacturers generally throughout the country. [Applause.] The common man believes that it is not being disposed of in good faith, but that an effort is being made to protect selfish interests in the disposal of this surplus.

Now, then, the question becomes vital by this opportunity of the Congress to act upon this matter. We now have the chance to restore the public confidence and to insure that the public interest will be safeguarded. We have a chance to insure that these supplies will be honestly sold and in a businesslike way. Are we to sit here and neglect this opportunity? Shall we allow these improper methods to be continued? The statement was made here yesterday that supplies for which the Government paid over $20,000,000 had been sold for only $2,000,000. Are we not going to do anything about it? This is our only chance, gentlemen. Unless you are willing to take some action, do not hereafter complain that the Government was robbed in the disposition of these supplies.

Mr. DENT. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I will.

Mr. DENT. Does my colleague think that the Government should deal directly with the individual in handling this matter?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Not as to all of the items, but the Government can dispose of the supplies in good faith so as to salvage everything possible out of them, and I insist that that should be done. [Applause.] I insist that we ought not to hold acres of automobiles and automobile trucks merely for the protection of manufacturers and dealers in them. I insist that all of the million pounds of meat that remains as a surplus shall not be disposed of in the interest of the packers of Chicago or other meat centers. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. I did not intend to interrupt the gentleman's speech, but I simply wanted to ask the gentleman a question. What is the gentleman's remedy?

Mr. OLNEY. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Not until I have dealt with my friend on my right. I am amazed that the gentleman, who so long graced the Committee on Military Affairs as its chairman, should expect a Member to rise up on the floor of the House and do something the committee itself only could have done in the committee room. It is for the Committee on Military Affairs to devise some measure for the protection of the Government and the people of the United States, and to insure that the millions of dollars in surplus supplies shall not be wasted. Of course, I can not do it. Neither I nor any other Member can get up here and propose a sufficient and adequate measure. The parliamentary situation will not permit it. It would be at once ruled out of order. But the Committee on Military Affairs must report some measure, if they want to vindicate themselves in the eyes of the House, that will protect the people and the Government of this country against spoliation.

Mr. LAYTON. The plan has been asked for——

Mr. HUDDLESTON. If the gentleman will pardon me, I have only five minutes. If I can get more time, I will let the gentleman state his plan.

Mr. OLNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Alabama be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. OLNEY. Have you not exaggerated somewhat the amount of canned meats on hand when you say 250,000,000 pounds?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I only give those figures because they come to me through the newspapers, and I admit to the gentleman that that source is exceedingly unreliable. But, anyhow, there is a vast quantity of meat to be disposed of. It does not make any difference whether it is 150,000,000 or 200,000,000 pounds. Honesty requires we shall get the most we can out of it, and I insist that it should be disposed of with that idea in view and that the interest of the packers shall not be considered at all in this situation.

Mr. OLNEY. May I inform the gentleman that I left the sales manager's office this morning, and steps are in progress to dispose of all the surplus products of tinned meat? Thirty-five thousand letters have gone out to State charitable institutions——

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I have only five minutes more.

Mr. OLNEY. I asked that the gentleman have five additional minutes so that——

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Not for the gentleman to make a speech.

I have no particular data on this meat situation. The statement was made in the press, on the purported authority of the War Department a few weeks ago, that they had some 240,000,000 pounds on hand, and they proposed not to find a market for it here, but to sell it on credit to Roumania. But I do know that we have hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of surplus supplies on hand. I do know that honesty to the people of the United States requires we shall get the biggest dollar possible out of the supplies on hand, and I do insist on every principle of common honesty that these supplies should not be disposed of merely to keep them off the market because it might do some dealer a little harm.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON].

Mr. LAYTON. The first proposition I wanted to state is that all of this stuff has been bought and paid for by the people's money. My plan is this: I am going to be specific. I will not talk about automobiles or about foodstuffs. You have one of the finest organizations that there is in the United States to-day, known as the parcels post. How easy it would be to send out a single case of this meat to every post office and let the postmaster sell that by retail.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I have data here from the hearings that will give some facts about this meat.

What we have on hand is this: We have 8,686,000 pounds of bacon, 11,847,000 pounds of 6-pound cans of roast beef, 17,333,000 pounds of 2-pound cans, 8,925,000 pounds of 1-pound cans, and 378,000 pounds of 12-ounce cans. Then, we have got of corned beef and corned-beef hash 5,620,000 pounds of 6-pound cans, 18,000,000 pounds of 24-ounce cans, 8,489,000 1-pound cans, 4,238,000 pounds of 12-ounce cans, 15,660,000 pounds of 2-pound cans of corned-beef hash, and 5,160,000 1-pound cans of corned-beef hash.

There are the figures.

Mr. TEMPLE. And I may suggest to the gentleman that on page 465 the totals are given as 141,000,000 pounds, all told.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Why do gentlemen quibble about the quantity of the meat? The matter is one of principle. I am insisting that the people of the United States be protected by their agents who are looking after the public business.

[Here a Member sought to interrupt.]

I have been interrupted so much that I can not say anything in proper sequence, and I hope, under the circumstances, the gentleman will excuse me. I can scarcely say two sentences without being interrupted, and hence, in consequence of the numerous interruptions to which I am subjected, there can be nothing added to my cry except, "Honesty, honesty, and the interests of the people of the United States." That is all I have a chance or an opportunity to say.

But I do want to cap that with one more thing: If the Committee on Military Affairs sits idly by here and proposes nothing to this House which will enable us to pass a measure which will protect the people of the United States against looting, then they will not have performed their duty. I trust this will not rankle them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. KEARNS, Mr. QUIN, and Mr. McCULLOCH rose.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio rises to oppose the pro forma amendment.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to address the House for a few minutes in reply to the gentleman who has just attacked the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did recognize the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McCULLOCH], but the gentleman from Mississippi was on his feet, and the gentleman from Mississippi is a member of the committee.

Mr. KEARNS. And, Mr. Chairman, I was on my feet before either of them.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is a member of the committee.

Mr. KEARNS. I happen to be, too.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, am I recognized?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Mississippi at this time.

Mr. QUIN. I thank the Chair. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that these gentlemen in making assertions here can be making them upon the basis of information. I am sorry to say that I believe they must be ignorant of the facts.

First, I want to assert that the chairman of this committee, the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] are correct in their statements touching this matter. The sales director, Mr. Hare, appeared before our committee and gave his statement. We contend that an appropriation should be made for the director of sales to sell this stuff in a businesslike manner. The aspersions cast upon the War Department and those in charge of these supplies and upon this Committee on Military Affairs by one or two gentlemen here are not warranted by the evidence or by the facts.

I want to say to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] that as to one item alone 650,000 bales of cotton linters were thrown upon the market in one day, and at a much less price than we paid for it.

Now, then, the gentleman rises and says that the Government is hoarding the stuff. It is true that these gentlemen are endeavoring to proceed in a businesslike manner and not throw this material on the market without getting anything adequate for it. Does anyone object, through the instrumentalities of the War Department, to our getting something like the prices that we paid for these vast supplies? Does the gentleman object, for instance, to the fact that the sales director has received $20 a thousand for lumber that the Government paid $28 for, which is now weather marked and depreciated by exposure?

I want to say that the sales department has demonstrated that it is disposing of this great mass of supplies in a practical and businesslike manner, and it should be upheld by this Congress. We can not let every Tom, Dick, and Harry come in with some wild scheme and throw all this mass of war supplies on the market, so that the Government will receive nothing adequate in return for it. The taxpayers of this country have furnished all this money, and they are entitled to have the consideration of sensible men who are disposing of this stuff. Many hundred millions of dollars worth of supplies would otherwise be thrown on the market, and the taxpayers would suffer heavy losses.

Now, gentlemen come here and talk a great deal about the food supply, its shortage, and the high cost of food. The chairman of the committee [Mr. KAHN] told you the truth. These meats, according to the testimony taken before our committee, are packed in great big kits.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. QUIN. No; I can not yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi declines to yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has asked questions that should be answered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not take the gentleman from Mississippi off the floor.

Mr. QUIN. This meat must be repacked under the circumstances and put into smaller cans or containers. That is the testimony we had before our committee.

Now, coming down to the analysis, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] read out the total 140,000,000 pounds of all kinds of meats, including beef hash. That would be only about 1½ pounds—not quite that—to each citizen of the United States. Do you believe that the people of the country are going around howling and growling for one little miserable 1½ pounds of meat which the Government is trying to dispose of in a sensible and practical way to the people who can acquire it and use it? When you consider all these different supplies, you find it is the same way. Some gentleman rises up and says, "You ought to use the parcel post and mail a 20,000-ton ship down to some fellow somewhere in the country." Some one says, "You ought to take 20,000 locomotives and mail them down by parcel post to some other fellow." [Laughter.] Other gentlemen recommend that these supplies should be sent to parts of the country where they could not be used, whereas this committee has recommended a regular businesslike method of distribution or disposition by which these things can properly be disposed of.

You ask, "Who is this man at the head of the sales department?" He testified that he was the sales manager of a gas-supply company in Philadelphia that had done a business of $40,000,000 a year, covering the principal cities of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. QUIN. I stated that Mr. Hare, the head of this sales department, left a great concern to come here at the request of the War Department. He has great ability. Anyone who has heard him testify is bound to admit that he is a superior man, and a very practical man, and he has valuable assistants. They are running this thing in an economical way, and if we leave this matter in charge of these good, solid, practical business men, instead of letting it go through the different branches of the military channels, you are going to get something like the value of these things. Of course, we do not expect Mr. Hare or anybody else to get dollar for dollar for all the enormous supplies for war purposes that this Government had on hand at the signing of the armistice, but he can come as near to it as anybody can.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. QUIN. I will yield for just a question. I can not give up all my time.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The gentleman is a member of the committee, and I should like to ask him a question for information.

Mr. QUIN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I wish to ask whether those charged with the disposition of these goods have not heretofore sold some of them to certain private parties?

Mr. QUIN. Why, they sell to anybody who comes up and pays the price. The sales department of this Government, as you will see if you will read all of this evidence, has under it all these different bureaus, and these things are advertised. They can not get bids on some of the goods.

Mr. GODLFOGLE. What I want to know is whether they did not sell, without advertising and without notice, to some of the people who came to Washington and who managed somehow or other to secure a lot of these things?

Mr. QUIN. They may have sold some things in that manner, but it is nothing like what has been stated here, that the Government is being robbed. There is nothing like that. I say to the gentleman from Alabama, Do not believe all these charges in socialistic and anarchistic papers that you may read, which are trying to malign the American Government. [Applause.] The War Department is running as nearly on an honest, sensible basis as we could expect, or as it has ever been run, and I ask you not to take all this enormous supply business out of the hands of practical business men and turn it over to those who know nothing about real business activities. You have a man at the head of this sales department that I never saw in my life until he appeared before the committee, but no man can listen to him without knowing that he knows his business. He has demonstrated to that committee that he can save us millions of dollars a year. He is worth the $25,000 a year that he is drawing. He says he can dispose of this stuff, the major portion of it, in seven or eight months' time. I believe he can do it and will do it, and if this Congress should take away from him the right to do it we would be doing a great injustice to ourselves and a rank injustice to the taxpayers of this Republic. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Alabama has intimated that the Military Affairs Committee is assisting the War Department in holding these supplies and in robbing the people. Does he want that to go before the American public? Does he really seriously believe that this committee or any Member of this Congress should be a party to such a scheme? Does he believe that the Secretary of War or anybody under him in a responsible position would be a party to such a scheme? I have demonstrated to you, if you have listened, that we have an efficient War Department; we have an efficient man as director of sales, who is acting in a proper way; we have an honest and efficient Secretary of War; and yet that charge which the gentleman from Alabama made goes out to the newspapers of this country and reflects upon the entire department in charge of these war supplies.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman is a member of the committee, and in a position to give the information. I know the gentleman is fair and wants to give the information. The gentleman has referred to the disposition of the lumber. Will the gentleman go into details and state to the House how the lumber was disposed of? Was it disposed of in a way to give a monopoly to a lumber trust, and who bought the lumber?

Mr. QUIN. All I can state to the gentleman is what the hearings show—what gentlemen testified to. Mr. Hare is not trying to dispose of this lumber to any monopoly. He is disposing of it to anybody who will come up and pay the price for it.

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman declines to answer the question as to lumber. Now, as to Mr. Hare. The statement that a soldier is a soldier, and that it is necessary to have the services of a trained business man, is an old story. We called in experts——

Mr. QUIN. I do not want the gentleman to take all my time.

Mr. HAUGEN. Does the gentleman refuse to answer further?

Mr. QUIN. Will the gentleman ask his question?

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman has called attention to the importance of having trained business men to dispose of the property of the United States. It is the same story that we were told about the Air Service. We drafted into the Air Service trained business men, and what was the result?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. QUIN. I should like to have time to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman state what advantage to the Government there was from that? I will ask that the gentleman's time be extended, so that he can answer my question.

Mr. QUIN. I should like to have time to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks for five minutes more to answer the gentleman from Iowa. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Mississippi be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman yield for a question? The gentleman from Mississippi is making statement after statement——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York object?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No; I do not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the extension of the time of the gentleman from Mississippi five minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa sought to inject not a question into my remarks but a speech. No; the War Department has not put at the head of the sales department anybody that is going to impose on the Government. Mr. Hare is not going to impose on the Government. The committee is not considering what the Aircraft Board has done. We are endeavoring to realize a proper value on the great stores of war supplies that the Government now has on hand. When the armistice was signed there were many contracts that the Government could not cancel because there was no cancellation clause. It had to take many goods, and I suspect that some of those things are coming in to-day. The Government must be honest in its contracts and it must be honest in its disposal of all the supplies, and that is what it is endeavoring to do and what it will do if the hands of Mr. Hare are upheld in the various works that he is engaged in.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Are these supplies being disposed of at public auction after advertisement or are they being disposed of at private sale?

Mr. QUIN. They are being disposed of in a proper business way, through advertisement, through letters directed to people who are likely to be interested in things that the Government has for sale.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The gentleman realizes that the laws on this subject were passed long ago and not in view of the present situation. So we now have hundreds and millions of dollars' worth of supplies being disposed of under a law never framed to meet such a situation. How can the gentleman defend the Committee on Military Affairs in leaving this in such a way as to go without providing anything for the safeguarding of the interests of the people?

Mr. QUIN. They are all safeguarded—first by law on the statute books; second, by an honest administration and an honest Secretary of War and efficient men surrounding him.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. My distinguished colleague has made statements about the ability of the head of this sales department. He has stated that he is the head of a great business concern. Does the gentleman know how many years he was connected with that concern?

Mr. QUIN. No.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does he know that the most of his experience has been as a newspaper reporter?

Mr. QUIN. No.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does he know that the sale of the wood and lumber was not made through him but through the lumber people and that we paid 12 per cent for selling it?

Mr. QUIN. The gentleman can speak for himself. I can not yield further. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from New York knows more about Mr. Hare than Mr. Hare knows himself, more than the Secretary of War knows, if he thinks that Mr. Hare is so incompetent, if he thinks that Mr. Hare is a good newspaper reporter instead of a business man, let him demonstrate it and take it to the Secretary of War, and he will have no difficulty in having Mr. Hare displaced. But it strikes me that this man is the most efficient man who has been before the committee for many a day. I know the Government needs somebody at the head of this disposition of war supplies who knows business and how to dispose of those supplies. Mr. Hare is the man the administration selected. He has made good in every respect, and the evidence shows he has saved many millions of dollars for the taxpayers, and that he will save many millions more for the people if he is left in charge. I am for him and his work. [Applause.]

Mr. KEARNS was recognized.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment be closed in 15 minutes, 5 minutes to be consumed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCCULLOCH] and 5 minutes——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California may fix the time, but he can not apportion it.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the amendment close in 15 minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What is the amendment pending?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is to strike out the last word.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I make the point of order that debate on the amendment is exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama makes the point of order that debate is exhausted and the point of order is sustained. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS] was recognized for five minutes to talk to the amendment. Can he be taken off the floor by a point of order by the gentleman from Alabama?

The CHAIRMAN. After recognizing the gentleman from Ohio the gentleman from California made a motion, and pending that motion the gentleman from Alabama made a parliamentary inquiry. Then he made a point of order, which was within his rights.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the gentleman from Ohio is a member of the committee and was recognized to speak, I will temporarily withdraw the point of order.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, to my way of thinking this is one of the most important items in this entire bill. The Government has undertaken the organization of a sales department to sell the surplus goods it has on hand. The Government has succeeded in getting at the head of the sales department possibly one of the greatest expert salesmen in the United States. It is his plan to sell all of these surplus products, whatever the goods may be, through this one department.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEARNS. No; I can not. When this organization was first formed there was practically $2,000,000,000 worth of surplus goods on hand. A part of it had already been sold under a contract. When this department was organized those contracts were recalled immediately, and these goods that had already been sold were resold at a profit of several million dollars. If we grant to this commission $1,000,000 that it is now asking, we are giving it only a part of what it has already saved for the Government.

What they have sold up to this time amounts to something between three and four hundred million dollars, and they succeeded in selling that amount for only about $14,000,000 less than it cost the Government. If these surplus supplies are to be sold from a hundred different departments, there will be no head at all to it. I want to impress upon the House that this department is only newly organized, and yet has already saved many millions of dollars for the Government. They are asking for only a million dollars to go through the coming year. They are going to save this country a half billion of dollars, according to the ratio of what they have already done. It seems to me we ought not to hamper its work by cutting it down to the very lowest amount possible upon which it could operate. I think we should give them every latitude, because they have already demonstrated that they can do the work.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEARNS. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman says that if this bureau is dispensed with there will be no agency to dispose of the surplus supplies. The gentleman is aware that each department now has its own office of sales and experts in that particular branch?

Mr. KEARNS. No; I am not aware of that; and I do not think that condition exists. If I could imagine myself being at the head of a concern that had the sale of $2,000,000,000 worth of various kinds of property, I am quite sure that I would call an expert salesman and put him at the head of that department.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEARNS. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. On that point does the gentleman conscientiously believe from the testimony before the committee that the present head of this bureau is an expert?

Mr. KEARNS. Yes. He pleads guilty to it himself.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. He does?

Mr. KEARNS. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. KEARNS. Has the gentleman from New York or any other gentleman any proof that he is not an expert?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly. Does the gentleman wish me to give it to him?

Mr. KEARNS. It does not appear in the testimony.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does the gentleman wish to hear it?

Mr. KEARNS. No; the gentleman can state it in his own time. If this man is going to sell meat, he is going to put an expert meat salesman on the job. If he is going to sell harness, he is going to get an expert harness salesman to sell that harness. If he is going to sell automobiles, he is going to get an expert automobile salesman to sell those automobiles, and so will an expert salesman be put in charge of the sale of each class of goods to be put on the market.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEARNS. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Under that head do I understand from the hearings on page 399 that it is the intention of this department to turn these goods back to the ones who sold them to the Government? In other words, is it the intention to turn this meat back to the packers, the automobiles back to the automobile dealers?

Mr. KEARNS. I get the gentleman's point. I do not know what the intention is further than this: The head of the department said that he is going to sell for the greatest price obtainable for the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. KEARNS. And I know that he is going to put experts at the heads of these various departments. At least he says that he has expert salesmen at the head of each department.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I want to speak in opposition to this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. What is the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. To strike out the first word.

Mr. BANKHEAD. And I give notice that the gentleman from Nebraska must confine himself to the amendment.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I want to inform the gentleman that that is exactly what I propose to do. I understand that we are now engaged in an effort to dispose of property amounting to about one and one-half billion dollars. The committee seems to have reached a conclusion that the centralization of the work of this sale will be wise and economical. They have made a specific recommendation——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman is not discussing the amendment to strike out the first word.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I am trying to get to the amendment, and if the gentleman will have patience he will realize that I am.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will note the——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Relevancy.

The CHAIRMAN. Relevancy of the discussion of the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Let us take into account for a moment the method of procedure in the purchase of property and the disposition of property under existing law. Whenever the War Department purchases property a record is made as to its disposition.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is not in order.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I must make my statement in order to illustrate to the gentleman from Alabama, or he can not understand.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska will proceed in order.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think the gentleman ought to be admonished what it is to proceed in order, because he is certainly not doing it, although the Chair promised to call him down.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. It may be a question whether the gentleman understands what the regular procedure is.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is to strike out the word "war."

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. And I am talking for the recommendation of the committee and against striking out the word "war."

When the record of these purchases is made they are charged up on the books in the property accounts. When that property is disposed of or disappears the person who is so charged must account for it at the price at which it was charged to him. Whenever it disappears he must account for its value when he sells it, and if the record shows that he has not exercised proper discretion in the conduct of the trust reposed in him he can be called to account, and there is where the special committee organized by this House to investigate these things can find a foundation for practical business.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, a point of order, and I want to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Therefore, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the present occupant of the Chair in good faith proposes to execute the rules of the House when I make a point of order in good faith that the gentleman is not discussing the question relative to the amendment, it is the duty of the present occupant of the Chair to sustain my point of order.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I am ready to draw my conclusion, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order and will say if from this on it is the purpose of members of this committee to adhere strictly to the rules of the House with respect to debate on pro forma amendments the Chair will sustain points of order and require the discussion to follow the motion that is pending.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California moves that all debate on this amendment close in five minutes.

The question was taken and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. OLNEY. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, as a member of the committee who has not spoken under general debate I am in favor of the million-dollar appropriation in this paragraph as to the policy of the War Department. In 1903–4 this country probably never faced such panicky conditions nor such hard times. Men were out of employment, commodities were cheap, to be sure, and I am going to try to prove to this House that the wholesale dumping of bacon, tinned goods, surplus products on hand at the present time would be detrimental to the best interests of the people, and by the people I mean all of us consumers, because after all most of us would like a piece of that bacon of which there are 38,000,000 pounds on hand, two and a half million pounds of corned beef, and several million pounds more of tinned meat. After all it resolves itself into a question of common sense. If we are going to dump 38,000,000 pounds of bacon on the American public, which is about a pound of bacon to every three men, and a pound of bacon is a great deal in the normal consumption of a family, you are going to stop production to a certain extent in this country, you are going to stop employment. Just as in the case of the knitting trade, if the surplus product on hand of fifteen to twenty millions of stockings is going to be dumped on the public, and you or I would like to buy a pair at 15 or 20 cents, you are going to stop production in the knitting mills of this country and that means cessation of the knitting industry in the West, New England, and the Middle States, where knitting mills are generally busy to-day.

Mr. HUDDLESTON rose.

Mr. OLNEY. I can not answer a question because I have only five minutes. So it seems to me we are cutting off our nose to spite our face. Now, when we consider the salaries of these men, Mr. Hare, his assistant, his coassistant——

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLNEY. No; I can not.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I yielded to the gentleman.

Mr. OLNEY. No; the gentleman did not yield to me—at $25,000 and $10,000 and $6,000, respectively, we must realize that in normal times in their own business those men received about double those salaries, and the Government is fortunate indeed to receive the services of those business experts at such salaries. This morning I left the sales manager's office, and he told me that in the sale of tinned meats and in the sale of bacon, about $25,000,000 worth of surplus products, he sent out 35,000 letters all over this country to State charitable institutions, wholesalers, and retailers, and has made as public as possible to all dealers to bid. Those bids close on June 20, and if the bids are not satisfactory the bids will be rejected. After all, it is the duty, it is the function, of these officers to receive just as high a price as possible for that enormous amount of goods we purchased during the war. We paid a tremendous price not only for meats and commodities—of course, that all comes under the law of supply and demand, and we had to pay a big price—but the Government is anxious to secure as near 100 cents on a dollar as possible through the Government experts who are retained for the purpose of cleaning up. I wish to insert in the RECORD the situation as to wool. We bought and paid for during the war 659,000,000 pounds of wool, amounting to $466,000,000. We have on hand 250,000,000 pounds, amounting to $176,000,000. The estimated shinkage and loss in value on that amount of wool which the Government will have to sacrifice in order to meet the foreign market is nearly $50,000,000, but we have to make this sacrifice. Public wool sales were stopped in Boston a few days ago because with the wool on hand it would have been foolish to sacrifice it, and after all, if we want to sacrifice these woolens, turning them over to the public for cheaper clothing, you would not relieve so much the burden from taxation of the people, because after all, the people—the consumer—pay the taxes, and if you want to sacrifice all this amount of material on hand at auction prices the people pay the debt in the end and suffer the consequences.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLNEY. I will.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that there is a ready market for woolen goods right now in Norway, Sweden, Denmark, England, France—cash customers?

Mr. OLNEY. Yes; and I have no doubt these officials are aware of those markets and will advertise in foreign markets as well.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But do these experts know of it, every one knows of it, but do they know of it?

Mr. OLNEY. As a member of the Military Committee I finally got over to France and inspected our best-known battle field, but I was too belated to join the major party. It is needless for me to emphasize our debt of gratitude to our American Army of 2,000,000 in France, what it did for the Nation and the great glory it brought to the United States. The two million men in this country ready to sail should not be forgotten, for they were just as ready to do their part as the Army in contact. I am in favor of the majority sentiment of the committee and an Army of 400,000 men and an appropriation therefor. This is but temporary legislation, continuing to July 1, 1920. When the time seems opportune for a permanent policy I shall favor a system providing for a small Army, not to exceed 150,000, and universal military training.

I insert the following letter from Brig. Gen. H. M. Lord incident to wool bought and sold and on hand:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE DIRECTOR OF FINANCE,
Washington, June 6, 1919.

Hon. RICHARD OLNEY, 2D,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. OLNEY: The following data relative to the War Department's adventure in the wool business may be the information which you were desirous of obtaining, as per our conversation this morning.

The wool account, as of May 17, 1919 (which is the last statement on record in this office), shows the following status:

	Pounds.	Amount.
Wool bought and paid for	659,244,199	$466,457,010.91
Estimated amount yet to be taken, domestic clip, and South American wool-purchasing syndicate to terminate contracts, etc	2,300,000	1,460,000.00
Estimated amount yet to be taken, second purchase Australian wool	8,500,000	5,700,000.00
Estimated amount due on old Australian purchase, withheld from payment until penny per pound rebate is adjusted with the British Government		3,500,000.00
Balance due on portion of second purchase of Australian wool already shipped		1,200,000.00
Total	670,044,199	478,317,010.91
Wool sold	411,937,119	301,382,187.31
Balance on hand and to be taken over	258,107,080	176,934,823.60

There has been used 50 cents per pound as a basis in arriving at the money value of the wool yet to be sold. If this estimate is a fair one, it means that there will be realized further on the wool account $129,053,540, representing a loss of $47,881,283.60.

Since the compilation of these figures there have been further sales of wool aggregating 4,000,000 pounds; this office has not been advised, however, as to the amount of money realized from that sale.

Very truly, yours,

H. M. LORD,
Brigadier General, Director of Finance, United States Army.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. OLNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York as amended by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARKLEY. What became of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, to strike out the entire appropriation?

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment was not made; the Chair has no recollection of it. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment as amended.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 15, strike out "$1,000,000" and insert "$500,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I demand a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 59, noes 77.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I ask for tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF.

ARMY WAR COLLEGE.

For expenses of the Army War College, being for the purchase of the necessary stationery; typewriters and exchange of same; office, toilet, and desk furniture; textbooks; books of reference; scientific and professional papers and periodicals; printing and binding; maps; police utensils; employment of temporary, technical, or special services; and for all other absolutely necessary expenses, including $25 per month additional to regular compensation to chief clerk of division for superintendence of the War College Building, $9,000.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, while this appropriation bill is under discussion I think it is appropriate to call to the attention of this House the act of a private soldier who, according to my information, has indeed made a most remarkable record.

Oklahomans and the Nation as a whole have a just cause to be proud of the splendid accomplishments of the Ninetieth and Thirty-sixth Divisions, composed of Oklahoma and Texas units. A few days ago I talked to a captain who was most severely wounded while across the seas, and he informed me that Companies A, B, C, and D of the Three hundred and fifty-seventh Infantry, of the Ninetieth Division, were the first unit that was successful in piercing the Hindenburg line. To do this it was necessary to go through five barbed-wire entanglements and two concrete fences. And, in addition, I have had brought to my attention to-day the record of an Oklahoma private, which, according to the information I have received, shows one of the most remarkable accomplishments of the entire war. The name of this young soldier is Will H. Rice. He resides in an inland town called Putnam, in Dewey County, which is some 25 miles from the railroad. According to the records of the French headquarters, he succeeded in capturing 171 Prussians; he charged 50 machine-gun nests and remained in possession of them for four days, until he was relieved. I think that his accomplishment is one of the greatest records that have ever been made by any private soldier. And from the further fact that the French headquarters has ordered him decorated and has made this report, I thought he was entitled to this consideration, and that this information should be given to the House of Representatives. So I am going to ask the Clerk to read in my time an account that was published in regard to Pvt. Will H. Rice, who resides in the Seventh congressional district of Oklahoma.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

[From the Daily Oklahoman, Oklahoma City, Sunday, June 8, 1919.]

OKLAHOMA FARMER'S SON CAPTURES 171 PRUSSIANS, RIVALING FEAT OF YORK.

PUTNAM, OKLA., June 7.

Rivaling the feat of Sergt. Alvin C. York, of Pall Mall, Tenn., who has been pronounced the world's greatest soldier, Pvt. Will H. Rice, a Dewey County farmer boy, charged through 200 yards of barbed-wire entanglements, stormed a position hiding 50 machine guns and a numbers of trench mortars, and captured 171 Prussian prisoners, according to word received here from general headquarters of the French Army. Confirmation of the story comes in the form of a citation, announcing an order for decoration, which has been received by the boy's father, J. M. Rice, who lives near Putnam.

Rice is a member of D Company, One hundred and forty-first Infantry, Thirty-sixth Division, and is now on his way home.

"Under violent barrage, Pvt. Rice dashed to the attack of an enemy position, covering about 200 yards through barbed-wire entanglements," the citation says. "He rushed on machine-gun nests, capturing 171 prisoners. He stormed a strongly held position containing more than 50 machine guns and a number of trench mortars, turned the captured guns on the enemy, and held said position four days, in spite of a constant barrage of large projectiles and of gas shells. He crossed no man's land many times to get information concerning the enemy and to assist his wounded comrades."

Pvt. Rice's father was born in Bavaria, Germany, but came to America when he was 16 years old. He was naturalized when 21 years old and has lived on his farm northeast of here for the past 24 years. Pvt. Rice himself is 24 years old. He enlisted May 27, 1918, and was sent to Camp Bowie, Tex., for training. He crossed overseas in August, 1918, and was with the Thirty-sixth Division throughout its campaign around St. Etienne.

[Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to give notice to the committee that it is very important that we get this bill through the House as soon as possible. The statement that has just been made and read is most interesting, but I shall raise the point of order hereafter on matters of that kind. It is very essential that this bill go to the Senate and to the President as speedily as possible, the pay of the soldiers, their transportation, and their subsistence after June 30 being involved in it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the actual and necessary expenses of officers of the Army on duty abroad for the purpose of observing operations of armies of foreign States at war, to be paid upon certificates of the Secretary of War that the expenditures were necessary for obtaining military information, $25,000.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania and Mr. DYER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WATSON].

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

My question may or may not be germane to the paragraph. I received a letter a few days ago from The Adjutant General stating that 8,400 of our soldiers were in Russia and 4,600 in Siberia. Has the committee any information whether they have been ordered to return?

Mr. KAHN. I will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the soldiers in Russia have already been ordered returned, and I understand that they are now being returned. I saw a statement to that effect in to-day's newspapers. The soldiers in Siberia are being held there with the soldiers of other countries to maintain the railroad lines so that food can be brought to the starving peoples of Siberia and Russia. The committee was informed that our Government is under an agreement with the various Governments of the world, and that each one of those Governments is placing a certain number of its soldiers to protect that railroad.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Has the United States any more soldiers there in proportion than our Allies?

Mr. KAHN. No. The soldiers there who are representing our Government are in proportion to the others. I want to say, too, that the War Department has called for volunteers to go to the Siberian line so as to relieve the drafted men and the volunteers. I want to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the department is having some difficulty in getting men to volunteer for the Siberian service. But every effort will be made to return the drafted men and the volunteers. They are not doing any other duty than protecting the railroads.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. The Adjutant General informed me that there were few volunteers, but most of them were conscripted men. Those with whom I have talked since their return from Europe state that there are very few men volunteering to go to Russia or Siberia.

Mr. KAHN. That is true.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. DYER. I move to strike out the paragraph just read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DYER: On page 3 strike out the paragraph beginning with line 15 and ending with line 19, inclusive.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, this bill is for the expenses of the Army beginning July 1 next. This item is for the expenses of officers on duty abroad to observe operations of armies at war. Now, I am in hopes, and I believe that the Members of the House are in hopes, that the war in Europe is over and that there is no necessity for having observers abroad during the next year. And to include this item in the bill, unless there is some reason for it which I can not anticipate, I think the House would be doing a bad thing. It would be encouraging in a way the sending of men or officers abroad to observe the skirmishes between the Bolsheviki and other forces of that kind, which, as I understand it, are the only forces at war now.

Mr. KAHN. Has the gentleman from Missouri finished?

Mr. DYER. I am going to yield to the gentleman to state the necessity for the item. If there is any, I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. KAHN. I asked Gen. Churchill, of the Military Intelligence Division, especially whether we needed that item at this time, and he told the committee that we did. There is a peculiar situation in Europe. The military observers who are operating with the various armies—liaison officers, some of them are called—are needed in Europe and elsewhere, and will be needed in the next fiscal year. One of these is in Dalmatia, another in Egypt, and three are said to be required at the Scoda ordnance works near Pilsen. Of course, so far as fighting is concerned, I want to say to my friend from Missouri that there is some actual fighting being done by the Czecho-Slovaks and the Roumanians and some of the other peoples of Europe. The war is not really over. While the various nations are acting under an armistice, the war is not really over and will not be until peace has been formally declared. The amount here is not a great deal. The War Department says these officers are necessary, and therefore I hope the gentleman will not insist upon his motion.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, from the statement of the chairman of the committee, in whom I have great confidence and who has stated the necessity for this item, I ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri is withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To provide means for the theoretical and practical instruction at the Army service schools (including the Army Staff College, the Army School of the Line, the Army Field Engineer School, the Army Field Service School and Correspondence School for Medical Officers, and the Army Signal School) at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., the Mounted Service School at Fort Riley, Kans., and the School of Fire for Field Artillery, and for the Infantry School of Arms at Fort Sill, Okla., by the purchase of textbooks, books of reference, scientific and professional papers, the purchase of modern instruments and material for theoretical and practical instruction, employment of temporary, technical, or special services, and for all other absolutely necessary expenses, to be allotted in such proportion as may, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, be for the best interests of the military service. Not exceeding $300 per month may be used for the payment of $100 per month to a translator at the Army service schools, Fort Leavenworth, Kans., $100 per month to a translator at the School of Fire for Field Artillery, and $100 per month to a translator at the Infantry School of Arms, Fort Sill, Okla., to be appointed by the commandants of the schools named, with the approval of the Secretary of War, $75,000.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WRIGHT: Page 4, lines 3 and 4, after the word "Artillery," on line 3, strike out the words "and for the Infantry School of Arms at Fort Sill, Okla."

Mr. WRIGHT. I offer that amendment because there is no Infantry School of Arms there.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. WRIGHT. There is no Infantry School of Arms at Fort Sill, Okla. It is now an Artillery fire service.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, do I understand the Chair to hold that new legislation is in order? I take it that it is subject to a point of order, because it changes existing law. The law now authorizes a school of fire at Fort Sill. The gentleman's amendment would change that existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order to strike out an appropriation at any time.

Mr. KAHN. This affects the amount of the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that it is in order to strike out. I think the members of the Committee on Military Affairs should read the amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Chair holds it in order, I would like to be heard in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds it is in order.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I hope the House will not adopt that amendment. Its obvious purpose is to change the location of the School of Fire, which is now authorized at Fort Sill, Okla., and which has been maintained there for a number of years. The Government has a large reservation there; it has a splendidly equipped post and institutions for that purpose.

Since the armistice the War Department has, in my opinion, unauthorizedly expended millions of dollars in the construction of a proposed School of Fire at Columbus, Ga. It has expended money, that we appropriated for the conduct of the war, for the creation of a military post to be used in time of peace. It is obviously the intention of the gentleman now to authorize the transfer of the School of Fire from Fort Sill, where it exists now, to Georgia. In my opinion this would be a great mistake, and a great extravagance, and I hope it will not be authorized by the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair calls the attention of the gentleman from California to an error in spelling on line 4, page 4, in the word "textbook."

Mr. KAHN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that "taxtbooks" be changed to "textbooks."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the unanimous consent request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I rise to offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send it to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. WRIGHT. I hope to amend lines 15 and 16 by striking out after the words "translator at" the words "the Infantry School of Arms, Fort Sill, Okla."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send his amendment to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask that the amendment be reported by the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia will restate his amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT. On line 15, page 4, strike out after the word "at" the words "the Infantry School of Arms, Fort Sill, Okla."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WRIGHT: On page 4, lines 15 and 16, after the word "at" on line 15, strike out the words "the Infantry School of Arms, Fort Sill, Okla."

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, there is no such school at Fort Sill, Okla. In fact, many months ago it was by proper Executive order transferred to Fort Benning, Ga., and it is now functioning at that place.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. WRIGHT. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 12, noes 50.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Creating, maintaining, and operating at established Army flying schools, course of instruction for aviation students, including cost of equipment, and supplies necessary for instruction and subsistence of students, purchase of tools, equipment, materials, machines, textbooks, books of reference, scientific and professional papers, and instruments and material for theoretical and practical instruction at aviation schools; purchase of supplies for securing, developing, printing, and reproducing photographs made by aerial observers; to maintain and replace the equipment of organizations already in service; equipment, maintenance, and operation of aviation stations, balloon schools, fields for testing and experimental work; procuring and introducing water, electric light and power, telephones, telegraphs, and sewerage; purchase of stoves and other cooking and heating apparatus, kitchen and table ware, and furniture and equipment for kitchens, mess halls, officers' quarters, barracks, hospitals, and other buildings; screens, lockers, refrigerators, and all other equipment; salaries and wages of civilian employees in the District of Columbia or elsewhere as may be necessary; experimental investigation and purchase and development of new types of aircraft, and aviation engines; purchase, manufacture, maintenance, repair, and operation of airships, war balloons, and other aerial machines, including instruments and appliances of every sort and description necessary for the operation, construction, or equipment of all types of aircraft, and all necessary spare parts and equipment connected therewith.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. KAHN. I suggest that the reading of the paragraph be concluded.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that the reading of the paragraph is concluded.

Mr. KAHN. We had this very question up before, and it has been held heretofore that in the military bill a paragraph means the entire item under a certain heading. That was the ruling of the presiding officer when the question was raised before. I suggest, therefore, that the entire section be read, and then the gentleman can offer his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If that is agreeable, the Chair will direct the Clerk to read the entire subhead before amendments are offered.

The Clerk read as follows:

And also for the purchase or manufacture and issue of special clothing, wearing apparel, and similar equipment for aviation purposes, $15,000,000: Provided, That claims not exceeding $250 in amount for damages to persons and private property, resulting from the operation of aircraft at home and abroad, may be settled out of the funds appropriated hereunder, when each claim is substantiated by a survey report of a board of officers appointed by the commanding officer of the nearest aviation post and approved by the Director of Military Aeronautics: Provided further, That claims so settled and paid from the sum hereby appropriated shall not exceed in the aggregate the sum of $150,000. That no part of any appropriations herein shall be used unless all former civilian flying instructors who were dismissed on or about December 31, 1918, shall be reinstated on application to their former positions as from the date of such dismissal up to and including June 30, 1919: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to apply to any civilian flying instructor dismissed prior to December 31, 1918, for misconduct or incompetency.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BLACK. I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I notice that in this paragraph on page 11 there is a provision which reads as follows:

That no part of any appropriations herein shall be used unless all former civilian flying instructors who were dismissed on or about December 31, 1918, shall be reinstated on application to their former positions as from the date of such dismissal up to and including June 30, 1919.

I should like to inquire the reason for that limitation upon the appropriation.

Mr. KAHN. The language of this paragraph is identical with the language of the bill that passed the House in February last. That item was put in on account of some difficulties over civilian instructors. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LaGUARDIA] is thoroughly familiar with it, and I will ask him to make a statement about it.

Mr. BLACK. I will be very glad to have an explanation.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I will state to the gentleman that in the various aviation schools in this country we had flying instructors. We gathered all the available material that we had at the time and engaged these boys as instructors. A good many of them were eligible for commissions, but they were not taken into the Army and commissioned for the reason that they were wanted for instruction purposes. When the armistice was signed these boys were suddenly discharged, although there was an implied promise that they would be kept on until June 30, 1919.

Mr. BLACK. On that point can the gentleman cite anything in the hearings to show that the War Department had any implied contract with these men to keep them until June 30, 1919? It is undoubtedly true that with the signing of the armistice a great many civilian employees of the War Department and the Treasury Department and the Navy Department and other departments of the Government found themselves without jobs, but are we going to put a limitation on an appropriation and say to the War Department that they can not spend a dollar of it unless they give certain men jobs until June 30, 1919?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. The gentleman can not make a comparison between some of the favored sons who were of military age, and who received jobs at pushing a pen in Washington, and who did not fulfill their military duties, and these boys who were able and willing to enter the aviation service, but were kept in a more dangerous work, that of instructing. There is no more dangerous work in the Army than instructing in aviation, and if the gentleman does not believe me I will be glad to take him up some day and turn the controls over to him.

Now, these boys were not given their commissions in the Army, and then suddenly, just to satisfy the whim of somebody in the General Staff, they threw these boys out.

Mr. BLACK. Where is the evidence that there was any implied contract on the part of the War Department to keep these instructors until the 30th of June, 1919?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am stating the fact to the gentleman. And if he will read the hearings of last year's bill he will find that it is as I have stated.

Mr. BLACK. I make the point of order on the proviso referred to.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman state the language to which he makes the point of order?

Mr. BLACK. Beginning with line 8, just after the figures "$150,000," and including the rest of the paragraph.

Mr. KAHN. The language is clearly subject to a point of order.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I should like to be heard on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York on the point of order.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I desire to state that the point of order was raised when I offered an amendment to the bill in the last session, and it was then held in order by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS], I think.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, in order for this provision to be in order on the bill it would have to reduce expenditures. The effect of the amendment would be to increase the expenditures, because it says to the War Department if you spend a dollar of this $15,000,000 we are appropriating you must put back on the pay roll of the United States Government certain employees who have been dismissed from the service. So the real effect of the proviso is to increase rather than to decrease expenditures.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a limitation on the appropriation, but it is a limitation that also calls for affirmative action on the part of the executive. Therefore, it is subject to a point of order, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 11, in lines 5 and 6, strike out the words "director of military aeronautics" and insert in lieu thereof "officer in charge of Air Service."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the language is obvious, and I do not think that I need to explain it. There is no director of military aeronautics at this time, so the proposed language will designate the person who is to do the work.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 10, line 6, after the word "work," insert "including Bolling Field, at Washington, D. C."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of maintaining Bolling Field is to have a flying or aviation field in Washington, D. C. The proposition is to abandon Bolling Field on the mere whim of the General Staff. They prepared to do so a few days ago, but owing to pressure that was brought to bear on them that action has been delayed.

Where we have aviation we must cooperate with every branch of the Army, and it is very useful and very necessary that we have a field in Washington where the Artillery, Signal Corps, the radio, and all branches may acquire the experience that comes with aviation. There is nothing in the purpose of abandoning Bolling Field except the pique and whim of the present Chief of Staff. I feel that by including Bolling Field in the general appropriation we will express the desire of the House that Bolling Field be maintained. They have come in and asked for millions of dollars to buy the Dayton, Ohio, field and abandon Langley Field after dumping millions into it. Now they want to abandon it as an experimental station. The general scheme has been to get swamp lands, drain them, and then buy them at an exorbitant price. We have spent millions on Langley Field and that is to be abandoned as an experimental station and buy at Dayton, Ohio. This amendment is to keep an aviation field at Washington, D. C., and not give way to the whims of the General Staff.

Mr. SANDERS of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of New York. Did not the officer in charge tell the committee that the only reason for abandoning Bolling Field was that the Secretary of War had ordered it?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Exactly.

Mr. SANDERS of New York. That he knew of no reason for it?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. When he was pressed for a reason we did not get any.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from California to state the authorization for that portion of the language in the bill as follows:

Purchase of supplies for securing, developing, printing, and reproducing photographs made by aerial observers; to maintain and replace the equipment of organizations already in service; equipment, maintenance, and operation of aviation stations, balloon schools, fields for testing and experimental work.

Mr. KAHN. The only authorization is that it has been carried in previous appropriation bills. The Army appropriation bill from year to year brings in these items and there is rarely any change in the verbiage of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. If there were general authorization for the language already in the bill, adding this specific language as a conditional activity would be in order, but there being no authorization for the activities provided for in the bill there is no authorization for the amendment, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Do I understand the Chair in reaching his decision assumes that there is no authorization for maintaining aviation fields?

The CHAIRMAN. No authorization for language in this portion of the bill. There is no specific authorization for that except the language carried in previous appropriation bills, as the Chair is informed.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I have a further amendment, on line 6, after the word "aeronautics," to insert the words:

Provided further, That no part of any appropriation herein shall be used unless the aviation field at Bolling Field, Washington, D. C., is maintained.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment which the Clerk will report. The gentleman will send his amendment to the desk.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I have to write it first.

Mr. CURRY of California. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to offer, pending the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 19, strike out the word "established" and insert the words "United States."

Mr. CURRY of California. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment is to prevent the War Department from using Government money in private flying establishments, such as they do now at the Curtiss and the Wright institutions. My amendment was adopted unanimously when this bill was before the House at the last session. It was stricken out in the Senate, and it has come from the Military Affairs Committee as it came from the Senate committee. The adoption of this amendment will save the United States a great deal of money and will result in retaining and developing certain aviation fields under the control of the United States and the United States Army, and prevent their being abolished, and prevent more money being used in the Wright and Curtiss and other aviation stations to the detriment of the country.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I have followed the gentleman's statement. Personally I believe that we would be making a mistake if we were to prevent the training of flyers in any school. This is a very important branch of the Military Establishment. We lost weeks and months of time in having to train flyers when we got into this war. If ever we should get into trouble again, I take it that the people would want to have as many men trained as possible so as to join the colors of the country and participate in the conflict. I do not think the amendment will accomplish any good purpose, and I hope my colleague will not insist upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CURRY of California) there were—ayes 16, noes 42.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 11, line 6, after the word "aeronautics," insert:

"Provided, That no part of the appropriations herein shall be used unless Bolling Aviation Field at Washington, D. C., is maintained."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman that he correct his amendment so that it shall come after the word "service," because the word "aeronautics" has been stricken out by another amendment.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Then I shall so modify the amendment.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order upon the ground that it requires affirmative action upon the part of the Secretary of War.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being made, the amendment can not be modified. The Chair sustains the point of order. It is clearly subject to the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For all expenses necessary for the completion, preservation, and transportation of the records pertaining to the draft under the act of May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," $25,000.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to proceed for 20 minutes, as I did not discuss the bill under general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to proceed for 20 minutes out of order. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, this bill is drawn substantially upon the lines of the bill that was reported to this House at the last session of the last Congress. In fact, that bill is followed in the report of the measure now pending before the House. It is true that the committee recommends some reductions from the bill as reported in the last Congress. The bill as reported at the last session of the last Congress carried in round numbers $1,117,000,000. This bill carries in round numbers $809,000,000, making a difference of a little more than $300,000,000. If gentlemen will examine the items of the bill it will appear that the principal reductions from the bill as reported in the last session of the last Congress are in the pay, the subsistence, and the transportation of the Army. This bill reduces the pay of the Army by $67,000,000. It reduces the item of transportation by $207,000,000. It reduces the item of subsistence by $30,000,000. Together they practically account for the decrease. It was my individual opinion that we should appropriate for an average-sized Army of 509,000 men, as recommended by the War Department, especially when it came to the question of the pay of the soldier, the subsistence of the soldier, and his transportation. We could not possibly have made any mistake if we had appropriated for the pay of an Army of 509,000 men, because if, during the next fiscal year, we did not have an Army of 509,000 men the money could not be expended. That is an appropriation for a specific purpose, and unless you had an Army of that average the money could not be used. I was of the opinion that we ought not to make any mistake in the amount that we appropriated for the subsistence of the Army. I was of the opinion that we ought not to reduce the appropriation for the transportation of the Army, and I do not think that we would have made any mistake if we had made identically the same appropriation for these three items that was made in the bill as reported at the last session of Congress. I am perfectly willing to admit that it is barely possible—I shall go further; that it is most probable—that the average-sized Army the next fiscal year will not exceed 400,000 men. I think that the demobilization of the troops has taken place much more rapidly than the War Department anticipated when they appeared before the committee last January, and that it is most likely that we will not average an Army larger than 400,000 men. Therefore I shall support this bill, although I repeat I think we could not have made any mistake if on those three items which I have mentioned—pay, subsistence, and transportation—we had been liberal, so that there could not have been any possibility of the soldier having to wait for his pay, his food, or sufficient money to bring him from Europe and take him to his home. [Applause.]

As stated by the gentleman from California in his explanation of this bill in opening his remarks day before yesterday, this bill does not establish any regular standing Army. It was not the intention of the committee nor was it the intention of the War Department to fix a standing Army of any particular size. The only purpose of this legislation is to take care of an average sized Army during the next fiscal year. It was estimated by the War Department that it would amount to something like 500,000 men. The committee thought 400,000 was sufficient, and personally I think 400,000 will cover the average number of men who will be in the service during the period of demobilization. I therefore hope that the bill will be sustained and passed with that number of men. So much, Mr. Chairman, for the bill itself.

I have the highest respect and the most kindly feelings toward the chairman of this committee. He has been my friend during the period that I served as the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and has rendered me time and time again invaluable assistance. He has been on the committee longer than any other member. He is one of the best posted men on military legislation in this country, and I am sorry to say that I am unable to agree with the logic of the position which I understood him to take day before yesterday when he was addressing the committee upon the subject matter of this bill. As I understood the distinguished gentleman from California, and he left the impression upon my mind, and I believe upon the members of the committee, that had his amendment to the national defense act, which was enacted in June, 1916, been adopted, by which the Army would have been enlarged to 250,000 men, instead of 175,000, as fixed by the national defense act, that Germany would never have challenged us to combat. I confess that I have been unable to follow the logic of the distinguished gentleman from California that a difference in the size of the Army of 75,000 men would have kept Germany from fighting us.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. BLACK. I desire to ask the gentleman from Alabama if it is not true that in 1916, several months before the gentleman from California offered his amendment, that Congress authorized an additional 20,000 men for duty on the Mexican border, and if it is not a fact that at the time the gentleman from California offered his amendment that the Army had been unable to secure that 20,000 additional men by voluntary enlistment?

Mr. DENT. The gentleman from Texas has accurately stated the fact, as I recall. Now, let us see, Mr. Chairman, what the real facts are. Prior to the Spanish-American War the maximum strength of the Army of the United States was 25,000. After the Spanish-American War the maximum strength was raised to 100,000. I make this bold statement, and I challenge contradiction, that at no time since the maximum strength of the Army was increased to 100,000 has the War Department, either under a Democratic or Republican administration, asked Congress to appropriate for the maximum strength. I came on this committee in 1909, at the first extra session called by President Taft, when this House was under Republican control. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs at that time was the distinguished gentleman in the person of former Gov. Hull of Iowa. I served two years under the chairmanship of Gov. Hull, when the Republican Party had control of every branch of the Government, and yet neither the War Department nor the Committee on Military Affairs ever asked for an appropriation for the full strength of 100,000 men. Under the national defense act of June 3, 1916, we raised the Army again to a strength of 175,000 men. What were the facts when war was declared, on the 6th day of April, 1917? There was an authorized strength, a peace strength, of an Army of 175,000 men, excluding the Medical Corps, the Quartermaster Corps, and the Signal Corps, and we actually had 127,000, speaking in round numbers, officers and men, in our entire Military Establishment when this Congress declared war in April, 1917. Now, is it possible that the logic of the argument of the gentleman from California can be followed that we made a mistake in not making the Army 250,000 when we made it only 175,000 and, as a matter of fact, only had 127,000 officers and men? The amendment of the gentleman from California did not fix any different way of raising the Army. He did not propose to raise it in any different way from what it was raised under the national defense act. We never reached the maximum limit under the Hay bill, and therefore how can the gentleman possibly argue that had his amendment been adopted Germany would never have challenged us to war? Now, I mention this, Mr. Chairman, not in any spirit of carping criticism, but I do think that the facts ought to be fairly stated. I do know that there has been a great deal of misrepresentation throughout the country, and especially in the press of the country in particular, as to what the position of men in public life charged with duty in regard to military measures has been. I have suffered from that as much as any other man on the floor of this House. I challenge anyone now to answer this question: If it be a fact—and the RECORD will bear me out—that at no time under any administration has the War Department ever asked for the maximum strength of the Army, whatever it may have been, and at no time has the maximum strength ever been urged by the War Department itself, how could we have been any better prepared than we were? I want to say in this connection that you can talk to me about our lack of preparedness as much as you please; you can argue from now until doomsday that this Government was not prepared for war; but I want to say that if it be true that we put over 2,000,000 of men in Europe within 19 months, if we won this war within a little over a year and a half, my God, what greater accomplishment could there be. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Let it not be forgotten that within a little more than one year and a half we landed over 2,000,000 soldiers upon the soil of France; let it not be forgotten that we had something like a million and a half in reserve back in this country; let it not be forgotten that we transported those soldiers to France with the destruction of only one loaded transport and with a loss of only 733 out of 2,000,000 of men.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will yield.

Mr. LITTLE. Can the gentleman tell me whether the statement I have so often heard, that only 11 per cent of the officers that were prepared at West Point got onto the firing line at all, is true or not?

Mr. DENT. I can not answer the gentleman as to the percentage of officers from West Point that got into the firing line. The information was given to the committee that 40 per cent of the West Point men went to France and actually engaged in operations over there and about 60 per cent remained in this country for training purposes.

Mr. LITTLE. But you do not know what percentage went on the firing line?

Mr. DENT. I do not.

Mr. LITTLE. The value of the preparation would really depend on the number or percentage of those prepared that got onto the firing line?

Mr. DENT. I do not know that I can quite agree with the gentleman in that regard. I think one of the most important things that the West Point graduates did in this war was instructing the novices in the arts of warfare. [Applause.]

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. Is it not a fact that the only preparation that our troops had that was of any value on the firing line was what they got on the firing line? That everything they knew before turned out to be of no particular utility in the present war?

Mr. DENT. Of course this war developed a lot of new things that had never been dreamed of in any previous war.

Mr. LITTLE. And the knowledge was acquired on the firing line?

Mr. DENT. No; I do not think so; but the gentleman is entitled to his opinion.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. As a matter of fact, the West Point officers did train the men in this country and as early as August, 1917, within three or four months after we got into the war, Gen. Pershing sent a cablegram to the War Department asking that the soldiers trained over here be trained in open warfare and not in trench warfare. So they were trained as we had always been training them for any war.

Mr. DENT. I do not think there is any question in the world but that they were trained before they went into the firing line, thoroughly and completely. I think that is one of the most remarkable things that was accomplished.

Now, Mr. Chairman, just a word or two more and I am done. I wish to state to the committee that 13 members of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House visited France in a body. We took along one of the official stenographers to committees. We visited the three base ports of embarkation and debarkation. Further, we went through the service of supply, visited the various business operations behind the Army, and from there we went on the battle field itself, being accompanied by officers who actually participated in these battles, the head officer with us being Gen. Summerall, who described the battles to us. He was commander of the First Division.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. VAILE). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman have 10 minutes more.

Mr. DENT. Five minutes, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DENT. These battles were described to us by Gen. Summerall and other officers who actually participated in them, right on the field itself. I mention this for the purpose of stating to the House that it is the intention of those members of the committee who made this trip to France and made this inspection, as soon as we can finish with this appropriation bill, to put the facts that we gathered there together, with the stenographic report of the description of the battles and what we saw in the service of supply, in some sort of a form, to be printed as a House document, not with any comment by the members of the committee, but simply with a statement of the facts as we gathered them on our visit there. I think that this will prove quite an interesting document, because we have the facts taken down in shorthand, right on the field, as described by men that actually participated in those operations. I may say that next to the fighting quality of the American soldier, about which no one anywhere now has any doubt, the most remarkable thing about this whole program to me, and I think that my views on this subject meet with the approval of most of the members of the committee, was the splendid business organization behind the Army, without which it would not have been a success. [Applause.]

In returning from the trip, separately and individually, I asked members of our party this question: "Next to the fighting spirit and the fighting character of the American boys upon the field of battle, what was the most conspicuous outstanding feature of this trip?" And without a single exception each one of them answered, "The splendid, well-organized business plan behind the Army itself." [Applause.] Now, that costs money. We perhaps spent money extravagantly, and you will find, when you come with your investigating committee, that there was a lot of money spent. You are going to find here and there that it was extravagantly spent. But I wish to make the prediction that you will come out of that investigation applauding this Government for the manner in which it has executed the most tremendous task of its kind that ever was even performed in the history of the world. [Applause.] It has not been done, either, by Democrats alone. This has not been a Democratic or a Republican war. It has been a war of the whole American people. [Applause.] Both Democrats and Republicans are entitled to this glory.

Let me remind you, gentlemen, that while the head of the War Department, the Secretary of War, is a Democrat, during the war we increased the number of Assistant Secretaries by two, so that we have three Assistant Secretaries of War now instead of one, as we had previous to the war, and all three of them are Republicans. So that while I think that perhaps it is a good thing to make an investigation of the tremendous amount of money that we expended during this war, I am perfectly confident that in the end an honest report is going to disclose that we are the greatest people on earth and that we can accomplish anything that we go after. [Applause.]

Mr. OLNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DENT. I yield.

Mr. OLNEY. In his impressions over there, is not the gentleman of the opinion that Gen. John Pershing combined great military genius with wonderful business and executive ability and that he was just the man for the job?

Mr. DENT. There is no doubt in the world about that. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts in what he says about Gen. Pershing.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas). The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to proceed for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENT. As long as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. OLNEY] has reminded me of that, I am going to conclude with this statement: That I believe that no particular man in this war comes out of it with any great conspicuous reputation, as was the case in previous wars, because it has been fought out on an entirely different line. But the one thing that commends Gen. Pershing, the one thing for which he should be praised by the entire people of this country, was his persistent fight to maintain a separate American Army under the leadership of an American officer, and he finally got it, and that is what won the war in the Argonne-Meuse fight. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I am going to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing in the RECORD a statement which I received this morning from the War Department, showing the strength of the Army, staff and line, under the national defense act, according to the different increments provided by that act, which, I think, will prove interesting reading, together with the statement of the Chief of Staff, issued June 5, 1919. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to insert in his remarks the document indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the statement referred to:

PRESS INTERVIEW BY THE CHIEF OF STAFF, JUNE 7, 1919.

The organizations coming out from Archangel which left there on June 3 are Companies E, G, I, M, and the Machine Gun Company of the Three hundred and thirty-ninth Infantry, consisting of 52 officers and 1,609 men. They sailed direct for Brest. There also sailed at the same time 2 officers and 323 men for England. All the remaining troops of the original Archangel contingent are expected to be out inside of two weeks, leaving there temporarily the railroad engineers, who were sent up for a special purpose this spring.

We have now the embarkation records from France for the month of May, and they break all records, either coming from or going to France, the total number being 333,303, just a third of a million. This total is made up as follows:

Officers	12,276
Enlisted men	315,665
Field clerks	208
Nurses	1,139
Civilians	1,515
Marines	514
Navy	1,307
Miscellaneous	679

The return to the United States of the divisions raised from National Guard and National Army sources has now been completed, and the Regular Army is beginning to return. During the week the Sixth Regular Division began its sailings.

The Army is now, or was on the 5th of June, 65 per cent demobilized. The Army in Europe is reduced to below 700,000, the figures on June 3 showing officers and men, 694,745.

The return of our Army from France continues to be largely through Brest, 49 per cent of the entire number coming out of that port; 71 per cent of all landing in the United States continues in New York.

Our demobilization figures, so far as they have been reported to date, are 2,391,639, of which 119,873 are officers and 2,271,766 enlisted men.

Enlistments reported to date, which do not include the enlistments reported at camps during the present week, 48,023, so we have gotten the first block of 50,000 men called for when we started in a month or two ago. Without question when the reports come in to-day from the camps, it will be found that we have gone above this number.

Enlistments continue with the three-year enlistment predominating over the one-year enlistment.

We have sent to Europe as replacements for the regular divisions there five battalions of troops so far, consisting in round numbers of 5,000 officers and men, the actual number being 4,929.

The number of commissions in the Officers' Reserve Corps, issued to officers, is 44,215, and there are on file 23,701 for appointment in the Regular Army.

The matter of getting places in civil life for men who are discharged from the Army is very well in hand. During the five weeks ending May 31 61,323 discharged soldiers applied for positions—applied to the United States Employment Service, and they actually placed 40,596, or 66 per cent of the entire total, and it may be of interest to note in connection with this that during the last four months, ending May 24, of the million men demobilized only about 30 per cent of them have applied for assistance in getting jobs. The rest of them had jobs waiting for them, or went to their homes or farms.

The Siberian problem is a problem by itself, and the War Department will be in a position to solve it, because a large number of the men who have enlisted have not specified the places to which they wish to be sent. In this general list of figures you will note the places to which the men wish to be sent:

American Expeditionary Force, France	10,219
American Expeditionary Force, Siberia	40
Philippine Department	2,046
Panama	154
Honolulu	1,336
Alaska	24

Those who have specified their place of service aggregate about 14,000 out of the 50,000. We have, therefore, 36,000 men who enlisted without saying to what place they wish to be sent, and, of course, they will go where they are sent. In the meantime the option continues for those who wish to enlist to specify their place of service.

Progress of demobilization and enlistments.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. KAHN. I thank the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] for his exceedingly kind reference to me. Our relationship has been very cordial and I hope it will always continue so.

Reference was made when we had the bill up the other day to the amendment I offered to the national defense act of June 3, 1916. I find that on May 8, 1916, I secured consideration of and a vote on the amendment which the Senate had inserted in the bill, when it was being considered in that body, authorizing a straight Army—not by increments—but a straight Army of 250,000 enlisted men. These very arguments that have been adduced here were considered then. It was repeatedly asserted that we would not get the men; that it was going to be an expensive proposition. But after all, my friends, psychology plays an important part in these matters. If the German Government had known that we could immediately under our law put 250,000 men into the field they would have hesitated, in my opinion, to sink our vessels on the high seas.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Was not the position of the German Government that whatever might be the size of our Army it would be impossible for us to transport it?

Mr. KAHN. That was one of the considerations.

Mr. WINGO. Was not that the sole consideration which they used on the German people in justifying their fight on the American people?

Mr. KAHN. I do not know as to that, but——

Mr. WINGO. That was their basis in advocating open submarine warfare.

Mr. KAHN. I know that the German officers who surrendered to the American officers said they realized they were defeated when the man-power bill was passed by Congress authorizing the enlistment of all able-bodied men from 18 to 45 years of age. They knew that their reservoir of man power was exhausted, and they knew ours was coming into being. The psychology of the enactment of that legislation was terrific in Germany. And so I maintain that the psychology of the proposed enactment for an Army of 250,000 men in the Regular Army of this country would have been exceedingly beneficial at the time of the enactment of the national-defense act.

Mr. IGOE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. IGOE. I should like to ask the gentleman what is the largest number of men that could have been raised by this country under the Hay bill in an emergency or in time of war?

Mr. KAHN. About 140,000 men.

Mr. IGOE. Was it not something like 300,000 or 400,000 men?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, in an emergency?

Mr. IGOE. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. If they had called out all the increments, about 225,000 men.

Mr. BLACK. You forget that we had the right to draft the National Guard.

Mr. KAHN. Oh, I bear that in mind. I have not forgotten anything about that.

Mr. BLACK. Does the gentleman mean to state that by having the right to call the National Guard into the service and recruit the Regular Army to its maximum strength it would only have amounted to about 225,000 men?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, no; I did not mean that. I meant the Regular Army.

Mr. BLACK. I misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE], I presume, referred to the Regular Army, and of course I only referred to the Regular Army.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of officers of the line, $28,605,000.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk reads as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 12, line 4, strike out "$28,605,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$20,300,000."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, this amendment and an amendment which I will offer to line 19 brings down the appropriation to an average Army of 300,000. The committee all agreed on the purpose of the appropriation, and on the desire to reduce the Army to the number provided for in the national-defense act, but some of us differ on the methods of procedure. I will state very frankly that if there is a doubt in the mind of any Member the committee figures are entitled to the benefit of that doubt.

This has nothing to do with the pay of the Army. It has nothing to do with the feeding of the soldiers, and I do not believe the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] will seriously contend that this amendment will deprive one soldier of a day's pay or keep him without food for a minute.

So much has been said about speedy demobilization, so much has been said about expediting the return of the Army, and yet we are appropriating here for an average Army of 400,000 men for the whole fiscal year; and if the gentlemen of the committee will take the figures submitted by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT], and if we demobilize all the surplus troops that we have in this country at this time, it will be impossible to use up all of the money appropriated for in this item. It is true the gentleman from Alabama says, "Well, if you do not use it, it is all right; it is there"; but the gentleman from Alabama and I differ in this respect, that the gentleman from Alabama really believes the General Staff will carry out this policy in good faith and I do not believe so.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. Is it agreed by the members of the committee that the figures which you desire to reduce this item to will be sufficient to officer 300,000 men?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. An average Army of 300,000 men, because the committee have taken 22 per cent in order to reduce from 509,000 to 400,000, and the same basis of computation will reduce it to 300,000.

Mr. SISSON. Do the committee and the War Department agree that you could take 22 per cent from this amount and that you would then have officers enough for 300,000 men?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If you take 22 per cent from the amount necessary for 509,000, it will leave the amount necessary for officers for 400,000 men.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, the War Department does not concede that we can reduce the Army below an average of 509,000 men.

Mr. SISSON. I care nothing about that. I want to know if these figures will supply an Army of 300,000?

Mr. KAHN. I have not figured that.

Mr. SISSON. I want to know if this will supply officers for an Army of 300,000 men, because I want to vote for that sort of a proposition.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will state how I arrive at these figures. The figures submitted to the committee by the Secretary of War is based on 509,000 men in the Army. When the committee decided to reduce it to 400,000 men in the Army, the chairman of the committee inquired of the department what reduction it should make, and reduced it accordingly. Therefore, having the percentage which would reduce it from 509,000 to 400,000, it is a mathematical proposition to reduce it to 300,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. If we provide for an Army of 400,000, what will be the minimum Army at the end of the year?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We are striving to have the figures provided for by the national-defense act—175,000 plus 50,000 auxiliary.

Mr. MADDEN. If you reduce it to 300,000, what will be the minimum at the end of the year?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The same. We are striving to do the same thing, only my amendment allows less discretion to the General Staff.

Mr. MADDEN. Let me get that through my head. We are proposing, according to the recommendation of the committee, to provide for an Army of 400,000 on the average. That would make a minimum of 200,000.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. If we adopt the figures of the gentleman from New York, we propose an average Army of 300,000. Does the gentleman from New York say if we adopt an average Army of 300,000 we will still have 200,000 as a minimum?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes. If I am wrong, my whole purpose is wrong. I say we all desire to have at the end of the fiscal year an Army of 175,000 men plus 50,000 auxiliary troops, as provided by existing law. By allowing appropriations for an average of 400,000 men we are allowing too much discretion to the General Staff, and they will keep a larger Army of war soldiers, up to the last day of the last hour of the four months' period after the proclamation of peace. But by cutting down the figures you will compel the War Department to demobilize the minute the troops come back.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman furnish the committee with the estimates of the War Department for a basis of 509,000 men?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. For officers only the War Department asked for $36,910,264. The committee reduced it on a basis of 400,000 men; brought it down to $28,605,000.

Now I bring it down to 300,000 and deduct the same amount that was used to bring it down to an Army of 400,000, and the result is $20,300,000.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. Referring to the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], is it not a fact that the amendment which the gentleman suggests would force the War Department to reach the minimum somewhat sooner after peace is declared?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will.

Mr. WINGO. I was not able to get the bill and the hearings until this morning. And let me say that since I have been a Member of the House I have never been able to get hold of the hearings on an Army appropriation bill until the general debate was started. I am not saying it in a critical manner, but simply to justify a question which no doubt I should not ask had I had an opportunity to read fully the hearings.

Mr. KAHN. We have had hearings ever since the Democratic minority members of the committee were appointed and——

Mr. WINGO. I do not care to discuss that matter. As I read the testimony of the Secretary of War, which is found in the hearings, page 8, discussing the estimates for an Army of 509,000 men, the question arose as to the wishes and intention of the department. At the bottom of page 8 I find this:

> Mr. DENT. I think it ought to be made perfectly clear that this is a mere temporary appropriation for an Army of that number during the period of demobilization of the Army as it was organized for war purposes.
> Secretary BAKER. In some aspects it is, and in some aspects it is not. This bill will provide for an Army of 509,000 men, and while there is probably no special likelihood of our being able to end the year with 509,000 enlisted men and officers, the preservation of the officer force necessary for that would be more or less permanently provided for by this bill.

Is it the wish of the War Department to provide for an officer personnel for 509,000 men, notwithstanding they will not have 509,000 men at the end of the year?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will say to the gentleman, and it is only my opinion, that it is not their intent, but they will make a desperate struggle to do so.

Mr. WINGO. I do not know whether I interpret the statement of the Secretary correctly or not; but do I understand that he says it is to provide permanently for a corps of officers for 509,000 men, whether Congress provided for that number or not? Is that true?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Exactly. That is what the General Staff is trying to do, and that is why I feel so bitterly against it. They will disregard the intent of this House and of the Senate. They have planned on the 509,000, and unless we take the money away from them for this fiscal year you will see that they will keep up the officer establishment and as many of the men as they possibly can with the money we give them.

Mr. WINGO. With reference to the gentleman's amendment, I would like to get information on this point. The gentleman offers an amendment which will provide for an officer personnel for an average army, because this is based on a yearly average of 300,000 men?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman's amendment is adopted, they still will have pay for an officer personnel for a minimum army of 300,000 men?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Exactly; and the way I figure it is that, if they in good faith demobilize the Army and bring down their officer corps to the number of the soldiers, then this is more than ample; and the reason that I can not agree with the rest of the committee in appropriating this amount and letting the surplus remain unused is that I do not believe they will carry that out in good faith.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. My colleague would not have the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] or any other Member of the House led to believe that the War Department—the General Staff—could fasten permanently 28,000 officers without further legislation?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, no; but for the fiscal year they could.

Mr. McKENZIE. They would be in the reserve corps, except the 10,644 provided by the national-defense act.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Except this, that they could hang on during all of the four months' period, and perhaps longer, into the fiscal year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to get some information. I would ask the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] this question: In making these calculations about the Army and how many men they are going to have and how much money they are going to spend, does the War Department take into consideration the National Guard at all?

Mr. KAHN. Not in this item. The War Department, through the Militia Bureau, has provided for the National Guard elsewhere in this bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. We are entitled to 424,800 National Guard men.

Mr. KAHN. No; not as many as that. I think 160,000 in the bill, because we are allowed 200 for every congressional district.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It is 800 for every Congressman and every Senator.

Mr. KAHN. That is after a number of years, but at the beginning only 200.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I shall ask the question direct: Is the War Department trying to abolish the National Guard?

Mr. KAHN. It is not, so far as I can learn. They have submitted figures to pay the officers and the enlisted men of the National Guard in this bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know; but that is to pay them for services rendered. Is the gentleman in favor, individually, of abolishing the National Guard?

Mr. KAHN. I never have been and am not now. I think the National Guard in this war did the country a splendid service and fully justified its existence. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They did just as good fighting as the Regulars, and the Regulars did all they could.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I do not want to weary the House, but this is a very important matter. I am sorry to differ from the position taken by my good friend, the former chairman of this committee [Mr. DENT]. The evidence shows that the President of the United States, the Commander in Chief of the Army, told the 13 members of this committee in the city of Paris that by the 1st of September all of the Army would be back from Europe, including the army of occupation in Germany, which, as I understand it, is about 250,000 men.

Why, then, should this Congress grant to the War Department the right to keep up an organization of 400,000 enlisted men? If you are going to give them 400,000, why not in honesty give them the 509,000 that they want and which this committee turned down? It is just as much nonsense to grant an organization of 400,000 as it is of 509,000. The only question, it strikes me, that confronts this Congress to-day is, What is the necessary organization compatible with the security and safety of the American Republic during the next 12 months? The Secretary of War in his evidence on that bill, which the Senate failed to pass by the 4th of March, stated that it was a stop-gap army. Do you know what he meant by a stop-gap army? Listen. If you cut this down to 300,000 as an average army, you can cut the appropriation of every item just as the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] has put forth. You understand the figures that were put up for 509,000 were $1,137,000,000. The War Department actuaries told us that when we cut it down to 400,000 we could cut on a basis of 22½ per cent.

If you cut 100,000 more, you can cut it down on the same ratio all the way through, and if you fail to adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], later on it should be put up to this House in a form that no part of this appropriation shall be spent unless the Army shall have been reduced to 300,000 men by the 1st of December of this year. Can they do it? If they are going to bring this entire Army back out of France by the 1st of September, where will you need an average Army in this country for the whole time of 400,000 men? Why would you need that organization of officers for 400,000 soldiers? It is just a question of getting these men who have fought the battles of this country and who are in the camps in the United States demobilized. The only way you are going to get these young men back to their homes and in their gainful pursuits of civil life is to cut this appropriation down for an Army of 300,000 on an average. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], our former Speaker, asked the question, Is the National Guard provided for? It is amply provided for. A hundred and six thousand enlisted men, and they are proportioned to every State in this Union. Yes; we have a National Guard of 106,000 men proportioned to all the States of this Union. Why would this Congress insist that you put upon the American taxpayer to-day an appropriation for an average army of 400,000 enlisted men and the officers necessary to officer them?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. I yield.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. My friend on the committee says that the bill provides for 116,000 national guardsmen——

Mr. QUIN. A hundred and six thousand.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Are they in existence as an armed force in this country to-day?

Mr. QUIN. They are going to be ready in the several States——

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. How long before?

Mr. QUIN. Some of them are beginning to take them in now.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. How long does the gentleman expect it will be before we will have these 106,000 men actually in uniform as an armed and competent protective force?

Mr. QUIN. Long before the fiscal year runs out.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. What evidence does the gentleman have in support of that statement?

Mr. QUIN. Because provision is here made for it and some of the States are raising the guard already.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. What is being done in reference to the raising of these men—how far has the work progressed?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. QUIN. I would like to have a little more time.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. QUIN. Four minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi that he may continue for four minutes longer? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. QUIN. All that the State wants is the appropriation by the Federal Government, and we are giving them that money, and the only way you are going to have a big Army of this Federal Government cut down from an outrageous number, a burden on the taxpayers, is to establish a National Guard, and every State in the Union for its own safety and security is anxious and ready for the National Guard, and the patriotic young manhood of the country will do the rest.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will my colleague answer this question?

Mr. QUIN. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I hope the gentleman will distinguish between pen and ink on a piece of paper, which shows that we have 106,000 men appropriated for, and the actual production of 106,000 men armed and in ranks, trained and ready for business. Where are they?

Mr. QUIN. We will have them. If you have 409,000 men with 22,000 officers, of course they are going to keep down the organization of the National Guard in this country. The only way you are going to get the American people waked up to the defense of their own States is for the Government to cut down this large Army for the Federal Government to maintain, and which so many of the officers of the Army are anxious to keep up. And they are not going to drop it if they can hold together this organization to what the Secretary of War called his stop-gap army for the next fiscal year. If that is done you are going to have the next session of Congress appropriate for an Army of 500,000 men. And now is the time to cut it out through the instrumentality of the purse.

I shall vote for the amendment of the gentleman from New York. [Applause.]

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Unfortunately I was not on the floor the other day, and I want to ask the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] about how many soldiers we have in France at the present time.

Mr. KAHN. We had in Europe on the 1st of May a total of 1,079,120, exclusive of marines, exclusive of the troops we had in Siberia and on the seas. The War Department has told us that they brought home in the month of May about 330,000 men. So I take it that they still have in Europe somewhere in the neighborhood of 700,000 or 800,000 men.

Mr. HASTINGS. Now, about how many soldiers have we in this country who have not been discharged?

Mr. KAHN. Between 400,000 and 500,000, I believe.

Mr. HASTINGS. And then we would have combined, approximately, 1,100,000 or 1,200,000 in this country and in Europe not discharged?

Mr. KAHN. We probably have at this time that many, but during the month of June there will be brought from Europe probably 300,000 soldiers and there will be also that many discharged in this country. So I take it we will have about 800,000 or 900,000 men by July 1, the beginning of the next fiscal year.

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. DENT. I have figures here that were given out by Gen. March, the Chief of Staff, last Saturday.

Mr. HASTINGS. Does the gentleman expect to put them in the RECORD in connection with his speech?

Mr. DENT. I will put them in the RECORD.

Mr. HASTINGS. In connection with your speech? Or will the gentleman give them to us now?

Mr. DENT. It shows that the Army on the 5th day of June had been 65 per cent demobilized, and the Army in Europe had been reduced below 700,000 men, or, to be accurate, 694,745.

Mr. HASTINGS. In Europe on June 5?

Mr. DENT. On June 5.

Mr. HASTINGS. How many did we have in this country on June 5, in figures?

Mr. DENT. We had a total strength at the signing of the armistice of 3,640,000 men.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. Does that include marines?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, no.

Mr. HASTINGS. Just another question, to either the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] or the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT]. How many troops were discharged, say, during the month of May in this country? Have you the figures there?

Mr. KAHN. I have not the exact figures.

Mr. HASTINGS. Do any of you know how many were discharged in the month of April?

Mr. KAHN. They are discharging at this time approximately 450,000 men a month, I understand.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is a little over 100,000 a week. You take it that there have been about 450,000 men discharged during the month of May?

Mr. DENT. I can give the gentleman the total figures up to June 5. The total discharges reported up to June 5 are 119,873 officers, 2,271,756 men, making a total of 2,391,629. Now, the total strength of our Army, I know, was, at the signing of the armistice, 3,640,000 men.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is what I wanted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS], a member of the committee, is recognized.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment, offered by the gentleman from New York, simply carries out a policy that seems to be the universal opinion of this House, to have the Army demobilized at the very earliest moment. Some gentlemen profess to believe that if we provide for an Army of 400,000 it will not hinder in any way an early demobilization. Others hold to the opinion that if the money is appropriated for an Army of 400,000, instead of 300,000, the War Department will be slow to let loose its grip upon these men who are now in the Army. I share in the latter opinion. I can not help but believe that the smaller the appropriation the sooner these men will be discharged from the Army. As has been stated upon the floor of this House, President Wilson told a group of Members of this body over in France a short while ago that it was his hope to have all these men demobilized—the entire Army—by the latter part of September. But Gen. March makes the statement in his testimony before the committee that it is the policy of the War Department to keep 225,000 men in Europe as a collecting agency to see that Germany pays to England and France and Belgium and Italy and Japan certain indemnities. I mean by that that we would provide an Army of that size to be stationed in Europe.

Now, we have in the Regular Army only 42,000 men. Where is the Government or the War Department going to get the difference between 42,000 men and 225,000? There is only one solution. If they are given this appropriation, they are going to demobilize the Army down to 225,000 men, and they are going to keep that many men in Europe as long as public opinion will permit, as I said before, to act as a collecting agency to collect for other Governments certain indemnities from the Germans.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. KEARNS. Yes.

Mr. DENT. Do I understand the gentleman to say that Gen. March made the statement that he proposes to keep an Army of that size in Europe as a collection agency?

Mr. KEARNS. He did not say "collection agency." That was my language. I do not know what else they will be kept there for. We might as well be honest with ourselves; we might as well talk in plain blunt English language. Let us not "kid" ourselves. The United States, according to the terms by which we entered the war, and according to the professions of all men who have ever made any profession on the subject, went into this war without hope or desire of any reward except the reward of helping to whip the Central Powers of Europe. We want no indemnities; we want nothing out of it except the credit of having whipped the enemy. But other countries are not so magnanimous. Other countries are wanting indemnities in the way of money and additional territory, and I for one am opposed to any American boy, be he volunteer or a conscripted man, staying in Europe for that purpose. [Applause.] And if we make this appropriation large enough, these men are going to stay there, and they are going to stay there for that purpose.

I have been advised upon reliable authority, and I have seen it stated in the press, that there is no provision in the treaty or otherwise for Japan to keep any army in Europe, and yet Japan is getting out of this war practically every demand she has made. Now, the question I want to put to the Members of this House is, by what process of reasoning do you reach the conclusion that the taxpayers of the United States should pay even a volunteer army of 225,000 men to collect a debt for Japan, when Japan does not furnish a man for that same purpose? I do not know that we owe to Japan a debt of gratitude that we would go to the extent of allowing or forcing the American people to shoulder a debt of that character to collect even a dollar for Japan.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEARNS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CONNALLY. The gentleman's purpose by his amendment is to force the demobilization and the return of the troops from Europe?

Mr. KEARNS. That is the purpose.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does the gentleman propose an amendment in the bill, either in the committee or here, providing that no portion of this money should be paid to the troops after a certain date?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEARNS. That proposition was discussed, I think, in the committee, but I think it was found advisable for some reason or other not to place that proviso in the bill.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the gentleman feels as he says he does, why did he not bring in an amendment providing that after a certain date no part of these funds should be paid to the troops overseas?

Mr. KEARNS. It is sufficient to say that the committee did not put a proviso of that character in the bill. However, we find the bill coming to us just as it is printed, and my position here upon the floor is to plead with the members of this committee to report an appropriation for an average Army during the coming year of 300,000 men, in order to force a demobilization of the boys who want to come home and of the boys who have no interest in collecting money for Japan or England or any other foreign government. [Applause.]

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEARNS. I have not the time to yield.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I will ask that the gentleman have one minute additional time.

Mr. KEARNS. All right. I will yield.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I understand that this appropriation for these officers is for an officer personnel sufficient to command 500,000 men?

Mr. KEARNS. Five hundred and nine thousand.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Now, in determining the relative number of officers and men, why is it necessary to provide for an officer force for 500,000 men and an enlisted personnel of only 400,000 private soldiers? I wonder if I am mistaken in my understanding that that is what is provided for?

Mr. KEARNS. I can not answer the gentleman's question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. KEARNS. I will ask for three minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that his time be extended three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEARNS. I am not sure that I understand the question asked by the gentleman from Texas. I can not answer it.

Mr. MADDEN. To put it in another way, if we have an Army which for the entire year will average 400,000 men, and that reduces the minimum number to 200,000 men at the end of the year, does the gentleman state to the House that notwithstanding the fact that we will have only 200,000 men at the end of the year we will still have officers sufficient for an Army of 400,000 men?

Mr. KEARNS. I think that would be the case. I will ask the chairman of the committee [Mr. KAHN] if that is not the fact?

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman is in error about that.

Mr. KEARNS. The gentleman from California says I am in error, and I am quite sure he is right in any statement he makes about it.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. KEARNS. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. The number of officers was reduced from the estimate of the War Department, from 28,000 to something over 22,000, to comply with an Army on the basis of 400,000 men. Six thousand officers were cut off.

Mr. SISSON. I think, if you will get the hearing, you will find that provision is made for officers for 509,000 men.

Mr. KEARNS. We do know that it is the expressed policy of the War Department to keep 225,000 men in Europe for a period of 5 years, for a period of 10 years, and under certain conditions for a period of 15 years. We know that is the policy that is being advocated by the War Department. We know that there are in the Regular Army only about 42,000 men, and we know that the only way to get those men at the end of the year will be to keep some of the conscripted boys there; and I for one am not willing to keep either a volunteer or a conscripted man in Europe. And we have had experience enough with the General Staff to know that they are not going to let loose of one man until they are forced to do so. [Applause.]

Mr. HOCH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. HOCH. I understand this amendment raises no question as to the general policy with reference to the standing Army, and that the sole purpose of the amendment is to speed up demobilization. If that is the purpose of the amendment I am certainly in sympathy with it. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee whether, in his judgment, it is possible for demobilization to be effected with sufficient rapidity so that the average size of the Army for the year may be reduced to 300,000?

Mr. KAHN. The chairman of the committee felt that an average Army of 300,000 might be sufficient; but when the chairman of the committee takes the figures that are presented to the committee, which show that we have now in Europe 600,000 men and that we have in this country practically 500,000 men, or 465,000 men, and assuming that between 300,000 and 400,000 men will be demobilized during this month, we will have at the beginning of the fiscal year, on the 1st of July, approximately 800,000 men. That will be the apex of the number that we will have in the Army during the next fiscal year. That will be the largest number. Now, assuming that we will bring 300,000 the next month from Europe, you would have in August to provide pay for 500,000 men. I think that they will further reduce the force in Europe so that we will have only about 200,000 over there. Then we will have toward the middle of the fiscal year something like 300,000 men. I do not think they will reduce that 300,000 below 225,000 under the national-defense act so as to conform with the law which Congress passed last February.

So that I take it it will be hardly possible to demobilize the Army on the basis of an average of 300,000 men for the year. I want to say frankly to the gentleman from Kansas and to the House that personally I favored such a reduction. But on mature reflection I am afraid it will be difficult to make it.

Mr. HOCH. If the only danger is that we may not be able to demobilize rapidly enough to reduce it to 300,000, there being a difference of opinion whether it is possible, as long as Congress is going to be in session and we will have an ample opportunity to take care of the boys, if demobilization can not be done fast enough, would it not be a good thing to put on the administration this spur for demobilization? [Applause.]

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. HOCH. I will yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I saw the figures, and examined them just now, which the gentleman from Alabama has. It shows that the department has discharged 206,000 for the week ending December 14 last, and it also shows that they discharged 77,000 for the week ending May 31. Everybody agrees that all those returned from overseas are being discharged, but a good many believe that the soldiers in this country are not being discharged rapidly enough. [Applause.] If you could discharge 206,000 for the week ending December 14 last, why could you not have discharged them at that rate, so that the soldiers in this country could have been discharged and not have half as many in the Army in this country as there is to-day? That is the criticism that I lodge against the War Department.

Mr. KAHN. If the gentleman will permit, four hundred and odd thousand soldiers that are in demobilization camps now are largely troops brought home from Europe and sent to demobilization camps for discharge. They are not men who have been in the Army in this country all the time.

Mr. HASTINGS. The figures show that only 77,000 were discharged for the week ending May 31, and that 206,000 were discharged the week ending December 14 last. If we have practically a million and a half soldiers both in this country and those over the seas, why were not more discharged for the week ending May 31?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is any question in the mind of anybody on this floor at this time as to our agreement upon one policy, at least, and that is that all want the American soldiers brought home from Europe at the earliest possible opportunity and with the most speed practicable under all circumstances. [Applause.]

Nobody disagrees to that; but that is not the question involved in this proposed legislation.

Moreover, if I may be permitted to suggest it to you in all good nature, we have not attempted to read into the figures or the text of this old-time, old-fashioned language of an Army appropriation bill any policy whatever. You all know, as experienced legislators, that the mere setting of sums of money in appropriation bills against the text, which year after year provides for these payments in that language, is not controlling legislation. It may be to some extent limiting legislation so far as immediate expenditures are concerned, but it does not declare the policy or fix the policy or determine who shall fix the policy or how or where or when. It simply provides some one for the time being, with some funds in his purse, to carry out a legislative policy that has already been determined and is not being determined then, because one of the rules of this House makes it out of order to propose new legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. Chairman, I realize that I have told nothing new, and I do not mean to be schoolmastery about it; but if we clear our minds to that extent, if we get to that basis on which to start our reasoning, we will take into consideration, in connection with that, another fact, which we also all know very well and understand as clearly. The President of the United States now has authority under the law, passed by this Congress and still effective on the books, to keep every soldier under arms in this country or in Europe for four months after his proclamation of peace, and he is the only man on the face of the earth so far authorized by the law and the Constitution of the United States to determine when he shall make that proclamation of peace.

Do not you see what sort of an uncertainty we are basing our mathematics upon when we suggest that this bill may be set for any definite and positive number of soldiers to be under arms in this country during the next fiscal year? It is absolutely speculative.

Mr. BOIES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but I would like to continue for a moment without interruption.

It is absolutely speculative in so far as we are concerned, and it may be that the President himself, with all his statesmanlike foresight into a future yet undetermined, may not himself be positive which date he will fix upon. And there we are. Yet we know that we must make something like an appropriation for the support of an Army, and we also know that, no matter how much we seek to limit the size of that Army by indirection, by suggestion, by making figures read a certain way, the man who under the Constitution of the United States is Commander in Chief of that Army has absolute authority not only by virtue of that fact, if not restricted by legislation, but actually in this instance supplemented by legislation which we have passed, to maintain every one of more than a million soldiers under arms until four months after the proclamation of peace, no matter with what speed they may be brought back to this country and no matter what the delays may be.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I can not yield now. I would like to continue this suggestion.

What do we benefit by trying this hot, stuffy, late afternoon to read into this bill an executive policy which probably the Executive himself has not yet arrived at and one which, whether we conjecture it or whether he himself undertakes to conjecture it, in the ultimate lies absolutely alone with him to determine and to put into force and effect?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Vermont has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I will not take any time from this House under any conditions.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman has refused to yield to his colleague.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I will not take any time on any conditions. I might yield as a matter of courtesy when it is proposed to me in like mood.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Vermont?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. How do we expect to limit the number and size of this Army when we realize at the very beginning, unless I am mistaken in my statement of the law, that the President of the United States has the authority, which we have given him under express and explicit statutes, to hold the present force until at least, if he so desires, four months after he himself shall fix the date upon which to proclaim that there is peace and then does so proclaim it? How are we going to arrive at anything except confessedly and avowedly to make something like a reasonable mathematical guess?

The War Department, it is true, in its propositions for Army legislation made before us last winter, undertook to get us to commit ourselves to a permanent Army policy of 509,000 men. We did not do it; the committee did not do it; and the House utterly refused to do it, and that language went into the discard. It was proposed in the Senate, but we all remember that the Army legislation died there by reason of what happened in the closing days of the session.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If the gentleman will defer just a moment. I have not taken any time this afternoon, and I would like to make clear my ideas about this, even if I do not convince anybody but myself.

Now, it is unfortunate that these figures of 509,000 as they are introduced again into the House by the proposition of the War Department, or by anybody else as a matter related to the Army, are associated in the popular mind, and perhaps, to some extent, reflected in our own—until we stop to think it out—as proposing a permanent Army policy, and the result of a determination to maintain 509,000 men during this fiscal year, willy-nilly. We have no assurance of that, and if there was one clear, definite understanding in good faith, the utmost good faith, among all our colleagues on the committee, it was that we should bring this bill out here before you gentlemen absolutely free in every respect from the slightest tincture or suggestion of such legislation by implication, inference, or indirection. The bill was merely at attempt to strike some equation between 509,000, which the War Department said the Army would average, whether from policy or necessity, and the 300,000 that other people thought it ought to average. And we fell in the middle with the 400,000 figure, which, all things considered, when there is speculation and conjecture as to what the President's policy will be and as to what conditions may be abroad or in this country, seems to be a fairly reasonable number. Because, whether we take the figures of 300,000, 200,000, or go back to the War Department's 509,000 or our 400,000, it does not matter which, at the end of the fiscal year if it is apparent that the President, in the exercise of the law and the authority we have already committed to him—and perhaps at that time under conditions and circumstances in this country or abroad which may justify him in doing it—has kept in the service more than 400,000 men, this bill is no limitation on him. He can apply to the Congress for a deficiency, because all the time he has been keeping them in the service under direct and unquestioned authority of law. There is no question about it.

So how do we limit him here unless we repeal that very law? Is there anyone here willing to take that responsibility and actually tie his hands in that respect? Certainly not. No one proposes it in good faith.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. May I have three minutes additional?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I do not wish to annoy the gentleman, but will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Vermont that he have three additional minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I do not wish to seem to be ungracious to the gentleman——

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I withdraw the request.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I thank the gentleman.

Now, then, I do not think that we can limit his authority by anything we write in this bill under these circumstances.

It is also true that not one dollar of this amount can ever be paid out of the Treasury of the United States unless there is a bona fide soldier in the service of the United States who signs the pay roll in receipt for it, and if there is such a soldier in the service it is only under the authority of the President and by force and effect of legislation which you have yourselves already given to the President to enforce. Now, what does it amount to as a limitation on the Executive when we set some kind of figure here in this bill to provide what we think will be a reasonable amount of money for the expenditures of the War Department in this respect for Army expenses during the next fiscal year? As I say again, if there are more soldiers than were provided for in this appropriation for pay, then they will only be existing under authority of law, and we will have to pay them anyway.

If we want to tie the hands of the President in any kind of fashion at this time, let us do it man fashion and write it in the English language in the bill instead of juggling with figures and pretending to curb him by indirection. [Applause.]

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

I would like the attention of the chairman of the committee a moment. He remarked a few moments ago that the number of officers had been cut in the estimate from 28,000 to 22,000. I wanted to be a little more clear as to that. Does that mean that at the end of the next fiscal year there will be 22,000 officers remaining?

Mr. KAHN. No. It means that there will be an average of that many officers in the Army during the next fiscal year. Of course, they will be let out as their organizations are discharged. It means an average of that many.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE], I wish to state that there was no agreement, tacit or otherwise, in the committee that any member of this committee was not at liberty to move an amendment to reduce this amount. And I will say further that I can not agree with the gentleman from Vermont that this Congress, that the House of Representatives and the Senate, are compelled, because the President is the Commander in Chief of the Army, to appropriate any figure which the President may require, for the very reason that the President is Commander in Chief of the Army. Under our Constitution the appropriating power is in this House, and that is the check upon the power given to the President.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Just one minute. I could not get any time.

Mr. KAHN. I wanted to help the gentleman along.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I want to say, further, that the gentleman from Vermont has been on this committee longer than I have, and because the gentleman from Vermont has blindly followed every recommendation coming from the War Department, without exercising his good sense, we found ourselves in 1917 without machine guns, without artillery, and without aviation. If the gentleman from Vermont had exercised his will as a member of the committee, had exercised his intelligence in Army matters—and he is an expert—then he would have protested when appropriating money for machine guns that that money was not expended; he would have taken action to see that our Army had the equipment that was necessary. But the gentleman from Vermont has followed so blindly so long every desire of the General Staff that he has grown in that habit, and now he is shocked to see a new member of the committee doing his duty as he sees it.

Oh, yes; the gentleman is solicitous about the President. He does not want to offend him. He does not want to embarrass him. I would like to know how much assistance the gentleman from Vermont will give to the President when he comes before the country with his peace treaty.

So the gentleman makes his appeal that he does not desire to do anything that might compel the President to move his troops out of Europe any quicker. The gentleman pleads with the committee that the President has the power, and that it would be embarrassing to vote to limit this amount of money. The return of the troops has absolutely nothing to do with it. And I will say to the gentleman from Vermont that the President of the United States told the gentleman and told the committee that it was his intention to get all of the troops out of Europe by September 1, and I believed the President when he said it.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, may I have 30 seconds by unanimous consent?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to say in utmost seriousness that I will not trespass upon your patience and good nature to make any detailed answer to what has been read into my speech. I prefer to let the notes as the reporters took them stand as what I said rather than the statement of my volunteer interpreter. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the Chair was in doubt.

Thereupon the committee divided; and there were—ayes 59, noes 37.

So the amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HAMILTON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 3478) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. CURTIS, and Mr. UNDERWOOD as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following concurrent resolution:

House concurrent resolution 11.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That, in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 2480) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, the Clerk be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to strike out the word "and" in line 14 of page 66 of said bill.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of the officers of Staff Corps and departments, $24,600,000.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I wish to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 12, line 6, strike out "$24,600,000" and insert "$17,429,367."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, this just keeps down the average on the previous amendments, so that I do not think any discussion of it is necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to say a word about this amendment. The House has shown an inclination to adopt the views of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

But some statement has been made here about what Gen. March proposed about the army of occupation, and I think it is only fair that this House should know what Gen. March did say. Gen. March made no statement whatever that it was the policy of this Government to keep 250,000 men in Europe, or any army of occupation there at all. I read from the hearings. Mr. ANTHONY asked him the question, "You do not know whether you are going to maintain an army in Europe or not?" And he said, "We do not," and there is not a line or statement by Gen. March that justifies the statement that we propose to keep any army in Europe at all. I think it is but fair that that should be stated on the floor of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of enlisted men of the line, $106,795,000: Provided, That the pay due enlisted men of the Army shall not be withheld from them by reason of the fact that their service records or other official papers showing the status of their accounts with respect to pay have been lost or not returned from overseas and, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, these men may be paid upon their personal affidavit as to date of last payment and condition of their accounts: Provided further, That payments made in accordance with such regulations (or which have already been made upon the affidavit of the soldier) shall be passed by the accounting officers of the Treasury to the credit of the disbursing officers making them.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to ask the chairman of the committee one question: What time do you want to quit?

Mr. KAHN. I did hope to get through the item of "Pay of the Army." I do think, if we do not have many interruptions, that we can do that in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 12, line 19, strike out "$106,795,000" and insert "75,728,230."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, this is in keeping with the general plan.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Eighty clerks, at $1,800 each per annum, $144,000.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the chairman a question or two. This is what is known as the Army field clerk section of the bill. I believe The Adjutant General has written to the Committee on Military Affairs giving his views in regard to the number of clerks required, their pay, and so forth, including the question of light, heat, and allowances. I find in looking through this bill very carefully that there is no provision made for these clerks abroad or here for either light, heat, or quarters.

Mr. KAHN. On page 16 there is an item "for commutation of quarters and of heat and light for field clerks, Quartermaster Corps, $76,800."

Mr. SIEGEL. I am not referring to the Quartermaster Corps. We passed an act, as appears in the testimony taken last year before the committee, providing for light, heat, and quarters. These men are required to furnish their own uniforms, pay for their own food, and furnish their own quarters. Congress in its wisdom enacted the statute. There is no provision made in this bill for them. If this bill is passed in the way it reads at the present time, these men, although in the military service, would practically be getting their salaries reduced.

Mr. KAHN. The committee considered the letter of The Adjutant General and did not feel inclined at this time to make additional provision for the purpose that the gentleman states.

Mr. SIEGEL. Does the gentleman think it is a fair proposition to those men who are in the service on the other side and who have been there the entire time and who can not leave the service that they shall get less pay, while at the same time Congress is appropriating $240 a year for every civil employee in the service of this Government? Some of these men, by the way, have been in the military service for 40 or 45 years.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIEGEL. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. STEVENSON. Is not the provision the gentleman speaks of found in line 4, page 16?

Mr. SIEGEL. Oh, no; that simply provides $23,000 for practically 2,000 or 3,000 men, who are now in the service.

Mr. STEVENSON. To which of those embraced in this paragraph does that refer?

Mr. SIEGEL. I assume it refers to the 29 messengers probably.

Mr. STEVENSON. Does the gentleman assume that they provide for 29 messengers and for none of the others?

Mr. SIEGEL. It seems that that is the situation.

Mr. STEVENSON. It does not state distinctly for whom it does provide.

Mr. SIEGEL. If $23,000 is to be divided up amongst 3,000 men, it would provide about $7 apiece for light, heat, and quarters. I suggest that that part of the bill be passed over till to-morrow, until we can learn exactly what the War Department desires done. I will say that the same kind of an error was made when the bill was up the last time and the same procedure was adopted.

Mr. KAHN. I will say to my friend from New York that the matter was under consideration in the committee, and the committee decided for the present to make no appropriation other than the amount carried in the bill.

Mr. SIEGEL. Does the chairman of the committee think it is fair to some of the men who have been in the service a long time, some of whom received distinguished-service crosses for gallant service on the other side while actually under fire, to take away from them what Congress gave them last year and the year before, when at the same time Congress appropriates millions of dollars to give the civil employees of the Government $240 apiece extra? These men over there, relying on what Congress did last year, are in the service, and being kept there against their will, have to provide their own clothes, food, and quarters, and does not the gentleman think that they should receive the same amount of money which we gave them in the act of Congress last year, when the emergency is not over, as the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE] stated a few minutes ago?

Let me read some of the letters giving the views of high officers of our Army in reference to the work of Army field clerks:

HEADQUARTERS CENTRAL DEPARTMENT,
Chicago, Ill., June 4, 1919.

From: Commanding General, Central Department.
To: The Adjutant General of the Army, Washington, D. C.
Subject: Army field clerks and field clerks, Quartermaster Corps.

1. My attention has been invited to H. R. 3154, introduced in the Sixty-sixth Congress, relating to Army field clerks and field clerks, Quartermaster Corps, providing for permanent allowances for quarters, heat, and light, for two additional grades of pay, and that the minimum or entrance pay shall be $1,200 per annum; for increase of pay for service beyond the continental limits of the United States; for retirement and longevity pay.

2. Army field clerks and field clerks, Quartermaster Corps, are an important and essential part of the administration of the Army and should be considered an integral part of the Army, and as such should be dealt with accordingly. Their work has always been characterized by a high degree of conscientiousness and efficiency which merits due recognition.

3. With the following exceptions, I approve the provisions of this bill and strongly recommend that it be passed:

The first exception is the two increased grades, $2,250 and $2,500, respectively. I believe that there are, under the present law, a sufficient number of grades provided, and the provision in this bill covering longevity pay will, in my opinion, make the pay of chief clerk and principal assistant adequate for the reason that these positions are not usually arrived at until after considerable service.

The second exception is the clause providing for the method of computing service for the purpose of the act, and in this clause it is recommended that the words "all governmental service" be stricken out and the following words substituted therefor, "service rendered as Army field clerk or field clerk, Quartermaster Corps, or clerical work of a similar character under the War and Navy Departments."

4. In my opinion the most important item in this bill is the provision for retirement. This provision assures the clerk who has devoted his life to governmental service in the administrative branch of the Army a sufficient competence to keep him decently after he has completed his period of usefulness. It is well known that many clerks now in the Government service who have reached the age for retirement—that is, the age at which they have lost their efficiency—are kept in the service with gradual reductions in pay, because humanity demands that a man who has devoted his life to the service be not discarded in his old age. The knowledge that retirement awaits the clerk at the end of his period of usefulness through old age promotes efficiency, certainly among the older men, in that it relieves their minds of the constant dread of the uncertainty of their tenure of office and of how they can care for themselves and their families after they have lost their positions. This is the dread of all older salaried men who have no assurance of retirement. This fact is recognized by all of the larger corporations doing business in this country, and they have made provision in their terms of employment whereby their employees, after having reached a certain age or after having given the corporation long, faithful service, are eligible for retirement at a certain fixed rate of pay.

5. While it is recognized that some of the provisions of this bill should be applied to all employees in Government service, nevertheless it is in these classes of employees that I am intensely interested, for it is their work that I have come best to know and to realize the value of through association with them in time of peace and time of war.

Subject: Legislation for Army field clerks.

1. With reference to H. R. 13910, introduced on January 9, 1919, by Mr. SIEGEL, regulating the salaries of Army field clerks, providing for a salary of $1,200 per annum for the lowest grade, and adding two grades with salaries of $2,250 and $2,500, respectively, per annum, and providing further that Army field clerks and field clerks, Quartermaster Corps, shall receive the same allowances and benefits, including retirement and longevity pay, as are now allowed by law to second lieutenants of the Army, I am informed that another effort will be made at the extra session of Congress called for May 19, 1919, to secure the enactment of this bill into law, and I desire to record my concurrence with the objects aimed at.

2. The work developing upon this class of clerks is very special in its nature; their value rapidly increases with their experience, making it especially desirable to retain their services as long as possible, and they are subject to the Articles of War and are frequently called upon to change station, thus being deprived of an opportunity to establish themselves permanently in any locality. They are members of the Army's mobile personnel and as such have good reason to look for consideration of the same nature as that shown other members of this personnel. It appears to me to be in the interests of the Government, as well as those of the clerks themselves, to provide for them in the manner they seek.

Subject: Legislation for Army field clerks.

1. The Army Field Clerks' Association having requested me to express my opinions relative to the merits of a bill (H. R. 3154) entitled "A bill regulating the salaries of Army field clerks, and for other purposes," the following is submitted.

2. The principle of graded pay with provisions for advancement and retirement is believed to be just, and the enactment of law-making provision for this is recommended. However, the bill as drawn does not appear to sufficiently protect the rights of either the Government or the individual clerks. Some provision should be made to insure the appointment of men fully competent and to insure subsequent advancement being made with justice to all concerned.

HEADQUARTERS PORT OF EMBARKATION,
Hoboken, N. J., May 21, 1919.

From: Commanding General.
To: The Adjutant General of the Army, Washington, D. C.
Subject: Army field clerks and field clerks, Quartermaster Corps.

1. My attention has recently been called to a bill making a more liberal and just provision for Army field clerks and field clerks, Quartermaster Corps.

2. The work performed by these clerks is arduous and unceasing and they are deserving of a more liberal provision for those who remain in the Government service for any considerable period of time. Living expenses all over the country have increased, making it a matter of impossibility for a man to live in anything like comfort on the salary now provided for these clerks.

3. It is a matter of impossibility for any of them, provided he be a married man, to lay aside any considerable sum as a provision against old age and future needs. Some provision is an absolute necessity in the way of retirement, longevity pay, increase of pay for foreign service, etc.

4. I earnestly recommend the passage of the bill as drawn, believing that it will be a means of holding those of our field clerks whom it is very desirable that the Government shall retain in service.

HEADQUARTERS OFFICE OF THE COMMANDING GENERAL,
Camp Custer, Mich., May 22, 1919.

From: Commanding General Camp Custer, Mich.
To: The Adjutant General of the Army.
Subject: Status of Army field clerks.

1. The present status of Army field clerks is very unsatisfactory and deserves careful consideration in connection with any legislation that may be undertaken for the improvement of the Army.

2. In order to be able to retain in the service certain high-grade men, at least two more grades should be added on the upward scale, and due to the increase in cost of everything there should be a substantial increase in pay for all grades. There should also be allowance for quarters and longevity pay as well as retirement for long and efficient service.

3. Field clerks are subject to military discipline and are under strict military control, but they are not given adequate compensation to give them a reasonable chance either for their own betterment or for the benefit of the service coming from extensive experience in military affairs. This increased value is correctly recognized in the officers and enlisted men and should be no less recognized in the intermediate grade of field clerk.

4. I recommend that this matter be carefully considered in connection with other Army legislation.

Subject: Betterment of condition of Army field clerks by legislation.

1. Having had frequent and daily opportunity to observe the excellent conduct and qualifications of many Army field clerks, both in the United States and France, I believe it would be of great advantage to our Government to retain the services of these men.

2. This can be done by legislation providing that they shall receive the same allowances and benefits, including retirement, longevity pay, and increased pay for foreign service, as now allowed by law to second lieutenants of the Army; and I so recommend.

HEADQUARTERS SOUTHEASTERN DEPARTMENT,
Charleston, S. C., April 7, 1919.

From: Commanding General Southeastern Department.
To: The Adjutant General of the Army, Washington, D. C.
Subject: Army field clerks and field clerks, Quartermaster Corps.

1. In connection with such legislation as may be recommended to Congress, looking to the return of our Army to a peace basis, it is desired to call to the attention of the War Department the provisions of the following bill, which was introduced in the last session of Congress, and to earnestly urge that it be incorporated in such legislation as may be submitted to the next Congress for its consideration:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Army field clerks shall receive pay at the rates now provided by law: Provided, That the minimum or entrance grade for Army field clerks shall be $1,200 per annum, and that the grades of $2,250 and $2,500 per annum are hereby created: Provided, however, That Army field clerks and field clerks, Quartermaster Corps, shall receive the same allowances and benefits, including retirement and longevity pay, as allowed by law to second lieutenants of the Army: And provided further, That in computing service for the purpose of this act governmental service shall be counted."

2. During the present emergency Army field clerks and field clerks, Quartermaster Corps, have been highly essential to the organization and administration of our Army; their work has been characterized by efficiency and industry; their services have been well-nigh indispensable; and in order to retain in the service the best of these men, who are specialists in their line, and in order to give to men who have served long and faithfully what they are justly entitled to, some such provision as the foregoing seems very desirable.

3. The feature of this bill which provides for retirement is particularly commendable. This privilege is enjoyed by practically all other persons in the military service upon qualification as to service or age, and in view of the military status accorded these men it is not thought that they should be excepted. The granting of this privilege to Army field clerks and field clerks, Quartermaster Corps, would be a good business proposition on the part of the Government. Many of these men have grown old in the service; some are veterans of Indian campaigns, while others served with credit during the Spanish-American War.

4. The matter of longevity pay also seems worthy of favorable consideration. Army field clerks and field clerks, Quartermaster Corps, are to my knowledge the only persons in the military service who do not receive some additional compensation for increased service. This appears to be an injustice which should be corrected. As a reward for long and faithful service and as an incentive for experienced men to remain in the service it is strongly recommended that this as well as the other provisions of the proposed legislation be recommended to Congress.

HENRY G. SHARPE,
Major General, United States Army.

HEADQUARTERS SOUTHERN DEPARTMENT,
Fort Sam Houston, Tex., May 26, 1919.

From: Department Commander.
To: The Adjutant General of the Army, Washington, D. C.
Subject: Army field clerks and field clerks, Quartermaster Corps.

1. Bills (H. R. 13910 and S. 5505) were introduced in the last Congress looking to the relief of a most deserving class of Army personnel; i. e., Army field clerks and field clerks, Quartermaster Corps. The provisions of these bills were substantially as follows:

"Be it enacted, etc., That Army field clerks shall receive pay at the rates now provided by law: Provided, That the minimum or entrance grade for Army field clerks shall be $1,200 per annum, and that the grades of $2,250 and $2,500 per annum are hereby created: Provided, however, That Army field clerks and field clerks, Quartermaster Corps, shall receive the same allowances and benefits, including retirement and longevity pay, as allowed by law to second lieutenants of the Army: And provided further, That in computing service for the purpose of this act governmental service shall be counted."

2. While I can not subscribe unqualifiedly to certain features of the bill referred to, such as the two new pay grades and to unqualified retirement, I feel that legislation looking to the relief of this class of Army personnel, in certain respects, should be had.

The main features of the proposed legislation are obviously retirement and longevity pay.

The retirement feature, properly safeguarded, is particularly commendable, but unless the maximum age in which this branch of the service may be entered is definitely fixed so as to base retirement on length of service I can not subscribe to this feature. I recommend that the age limit for appointment as Army field clerk or field clerk, Quartermaster Corps, be fixed at 40 years, and that, except for physical disability incident to the service, 25 years of service be made a requisite for retirement, including commissioned and enlisted service. Thus modified, I recommend the enactment of this legislation.

The longevity pay feature should also be enacted, provided the base pay is not placed so high so as to render longevity increase unjustifiable. I recommend that the pay grades for Army field clerks and field clerks, Quartermaster Corps, be fixed at $1,200, $1,400, $1,600, and $1,700 base pay, and that they be allowed the same increase of pay for longevity as is now allowed commissioned officers of the Army.

3. During the present emergency the work of Army field clerks and field clerks, Quartermaster Corps, has, in the majority of cases, been characteristic of efficiency and industry. In order to retain in the service the best of these men, those who are specialists in their line, and in order to give to men who have served long and faithfully what they are justly entitled to, some such provision as the foregoing seems very desirable, and I recommend that suitable legislation to accomplish this be submitted for consideration of the present Congress.

DER. C. CABELL,
Major General, United States Army.

HEADQUARTERS MIDDLE ATLANTIC COAST ARTILLERY DISTRICT,
Fort Totten, N. Y., May 15 1919.

From: District Commander.
To: The Adjutant General of the Army (through Commanding General Eastern Department).
Subject: Army field clerks.

1. In view of the fact that legislation granting certain allowances and benefits to Army field clerks is to be introduced when Congress convenes in the near future for extra session, I wish to make the following remarks regarding Army field clerks.

2. Seven Army field clerks have been constantly under my personal observation during the entire emergency and have fulfilled their duties in a manner entirely satisfactory to all concerned, and I believe it proper that I should say a word regarding Army field clerks at this time. I found these clerks to be thoroughly reliable at all times, and in general a valuable asset to the efficient administration of the district and worthy of the highest commendation.

3. It is therefore recommended that these legislative measures be given favorable consideration in order that those clerks who are now in the service and who have arrived at a high state of efficiency in their particular line will have some inducement to remain in the service, thereby maintaining in the Army a staff of clerical help commensurate with its requirements.

Colonel, C. A. C.

[First indorsement.]

HEADQUARTERS EASTERN DEPARTMENT, May 19, 1919.

To Commanding General Eastern Department:

1. The office work of the Army is as essential to its existence and its purpose as are the arms bearers in the trenches. The office work is performed by clerks, whose status has not been made secure. These clerks constitute an integral and important part of the fighting machine. They must have superior intelligence and fair education. They make the Army their life work and become experts in their respective lines. They are indispensable. They are paid a salary that barely enables them to live in modest fashion. It is not possible for them adequately to provide for their declining years. As their years advance their capacity for work declines after a certain period. Being specialists in Army work, they can not find employment elsewhere. Some of them have grown feeble in the Government service, and their long and faithful work is deserving of recognition. Having no income except the pay roll, they are held in service until they die.

2. Such a condition is unworthy of the great Government they serve and against that Government's best interest. It is a condition that has long called for remedial action. The wisdom and desirability of remedial action has long been recognized. The condition, however, has been permitted to drift for lack of forceful and earnest presentation. It is a condition that must terminate sometime. The sooner the better. Efficient service, credit to the Government, and justice to the clerks demand remedial action. I believe what is best for all interests would be accomplished by the enactment of a law as follows:

"A bill to increase the efficiency of the Army, and for other purposes.

"Be it enacted, etc., That Army field clerks and field clerks, Quartermaster Corps, shall receive pay at the rates now provided by law: Provided, That the minimum grade for Army field clerks shall be $1,200 per annum, and the grades of $2,250 and $2,500 per annum are hereby created: And provided further, That Army field clerks and field clerks, Quartermaster Corps, shall receive the same allowances and benefits, including retirement, longevity pay, and increase of pay for foreign service as are now or shall hereafter be allowed by law to second lieutenants of the United States Army; and that for the purpose of this act all governmental service under the War and Navy Departments shall be counted.

"All laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this bill are hereby repealed."

I recommend the passage of the bill as drawn.

H. O. S. HEISTAND,
Adjutant General, Adjutant.

[Second indorsement.]

HEADQUARTERS EASTERN DEPARTMENT, May 20, 1919.

To The Adjutant General of the Army, War Department, Washington, D. C.:

1. I concur in the first indorsement and earnestly recommend, in the interest of the very deserving employees referred to, such legislation as is suggested in the second paragraph of the first indorsement.

2. This has been a burning question for years, and I know of no more deserving or faithful employees than those cited, and something should be done in their interest.

(Signed) T. H. BARRY,
Major General, United States Army, Commanding.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, when the Committee on Military Affairs had the bill under consideration it was presented with a great many propositions to increase pay and increase the allowances of many men in the Military Establishment. The committee decided that in this bill those matters would not be taken up. In the first place, it became incumbent upon the committee to get speedy action on the bill and get it before the House. The committee felt that every time one of these increases would come upon the floor the probability was that a fight would be made on the item and a great deal of time consumed in the passage of the bill. The committee realizes that the bill must pass before the 1st of July. Otherwise, every soldier who is demobilized after that date can not receive his final pay or his transportation home until the bill passes. It was in the interest of economy of time that the committee, when considering the bill, decided not to take any action on these matters of increased pay or allowances.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield to me for an inquiry?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman hope to complete his bill to-morrow?

Mr. KAHN. I hope that I may be able to do that.

Mr. MONDELL. May I make the announcement that if this bill is completed to-morrow, or when it is completed, the House will take up the naval bill? It is rather important, as the gentleman from California has just suggested, that the House dispose of this bill as soon as is consistent with due and proper consideration of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Seven clerks, at $2,000 each per annum, $14,000.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. A short time ago I made a statement in the House that it was the policy of the War Department to keep 225,000 men in Europe as an army of occupation. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] a few moments ago called me to task for that statement, and said that Gen. March had not given me the right from any statement of his to draw such a conclusion as that. I want at this time, having asked the privilege of trespassing on your time and patience, to read you one or two lines from Gen. March's testimony, and you can draw your conclusion as to whether I was justified in putting that interpretation on his statement:

Mr. CALDWELL. In making up the figures for the 509,000 men, about what proportion did you consider would be in the army of occupation?
Gen. MARCH. I have thought personally that about 225,000 men would be sufficient.
Mr. CALDWELL. So that practically half of them would be an army of occupation?
Gen. MARCH. Yes.
Mr. CALDWELL. That would be eight divisions?
Gen. MARCH. That includes the service of supply troops.

I do not know whether I can read understandingly the English language or not, but I can trust you to put the same interpretation on that language that I have.

Later on he was asked to define what he meant by an army of occupation, and in substance he says, but not his language, "My idea of an army of occupation in Europe is an army that will force Germany to live up to her agreement as to indemnity." [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Five hundred and twenty-six clerks, at $1,200 each per annum, $631,800.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to correct the total.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, line 20, strike out "$631,800" and insert "$631,200."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

One hundred and nineteen messengers, at $720 each per annum, $85,580.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to correct the total.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, line 23, strike out the figures "$85,580" and insert $85,680."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Thirty-nine messengers, at $720 each per annum, $28,800.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to correct a total.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, line 2, strike out "$28,800" and insert "$28,080."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

All the money hereinbefore appropriated for pay of the Army and miscellaneous, except the appropriation for mileage to commissioned officers, contract surgeons, expert accountant, Inspector General's Department, Army field clerks, and field clerks of the Quartermaster Corps, when authorized by law, shall be disbursed and accounted for as pay of the Army, and for that purpose shall constitute one fund.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 5227, the Army appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow immediately after reading the Journal and the disposition of preferential business I be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes. I wish to explain that I was on the list of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] on Monday for general debate, but owing to absence on account of illness I was prevented from taking that opportunity.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that on to-morrow immediately after the reading of the Journal and preferential business he be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not want to appear as preventing any gentleman from addressing the House on matters which I am sure are of interest to the House. I am exceedingly anxious to get this bill through. I did hope to finish to-morrow evening before we adjourn. I presume the Members of the House will not object to staying 20 minutes longer in the evening in order to finish the bill. I shall not object, but I say to members of the committee and of the House that I hope to finish this bill to-morrow, no matter how late we have to stay.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER.

Mr. MORIN appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

S. 120. An act to repeal chapter 154 of the acts of the second session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, being the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution to authorize the President in time of war to supervise or take possession and assume control of any telegraph, telephone, marine cable, or radio system or systems or any part thereof, and to operate the same in such manner as may be needful or desirable for the duration of the war and to provide just compensation therefor," approved July 16, 1918; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. FIELDS, for two days, on account of illness.

To Mr. KITCHIN, indefinitely, on account of illness in family.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 19 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, June 12, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, June 12, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thy throne is established in the heavens. Thy kingdom ruleth over all. Justice and judgment are the habitation of Thy throne. We come to Thee with the work of our hands, feeling our insufficiency, our proneness to err, admitting before Thee that we have come short of Thy glory. We pray that Thou wilt look upon us with Thine infinite compassion, and lead us, that we may measure up to the divine purpose and ever be willing to follow the divine counsel. Hear us to-day. Bless us, for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. MCKELLAR and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a telegram from the mayor of Chicago protesting against the proposed increase of telephone rates for local service in the city of Chicago. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHICAGO, ILL., June 7, 1919.

LAWRENCE Y. SHERMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The Chicago Telephone Co. has issued an announcement that "by direction of the Postmaster General" telephone rates will be raised in Chicago, effective June 16. As you represent a Chicago constituency, I ask you to protest against such an unjustifiable exercise of the war power of the Federal Government, and I suggest, further, that Congress take appropriate action to divest the executive branch of the Government of power to arbitrarily fix rates to be charged by public utilities for local service, which power may be abused and the interests of the people sacrificed to the utility corporations. The public has a right to be heard on a question of the magnitude the decision of which means millions of dollars to our people. Previous efforts of the telephone company to raise rates have been considered by our citizens as brazen attempts to rob the people of Chicago.

WILLIAM HALE THOMPSON, Mayor.

Mr. WARREN presented memorials of sundry citizens of Johnson County and Park County, in the State of Wyoming, remonstrating against the proposed extension of the Yellowstone National Park, which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PHIPPS presented memorials of the Woman's Christian Temperance Unions of Hotchkiss, Olathe, Julesburg, Colorado Springs, Las Animas, Genoa, Ouray, Walsenburg, Denver, Sterling, and Fort Morgan, all in the State of Colorado, remonstrating against the repeal of war-time prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. NEWBERRY (for Mr. TOWNSEND) presented a petition of sundry citizens of Detroit, Mich., praying for the repeal of the tax on ice cream, sodas, and soft drinks, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also (for Mr. TOWNSEND) presented memorials of sundry citizens of Saginaw, Holton, Elk Rapids, Constantine, Yale, and Weston, all in the State of Michigan, remonstrating against the repeal of war-time prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also (for Mr. TOWNSEND) presented a petition of Gilead Grange, No. 400, Patrons of Husbandry, of Bronson, Mich., praying for the repeal of the so-called daylight-saving law, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also (for Mr. TOWNSEND) presented a memorial of Local Union No. 1330, Millmen's Union, of Grand Rapids, Mich., remonstrating against the repeal of the so-called daylight-saving law, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. SUTHERLAND presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Grant County, W. Va., remonstrating against the repeal of war-time prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. NELSON. I have here a letter in the form of a petition praying for the repeal of the daylight-saving law. It is very short, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE AMERICAN SOCIETY OF EQUITY,
HASTINGS, MINN., June 6, 1919.

Hon. KNUTE NELSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The annual convention of the Minnesota State Union American Society of Equity was held in St. Paul on June 3 and 4. Over 200 delegates were present at this convention, representing the farmers in every section of the State.

This gathering of actual tillers of the soil were unanimously opposed to the further continuation of the daylight-saving law and condemned it as a nuisance on the grounds that it causes discontent among the farm boys and hired help on the farms and actually interferes with the production, harvesting, and marketing of farm products.

You, of course, understand that the heavy dew prevents work in the fields early in the morning at certain seasons of the year. This change in the time causes the loss of an additional hour in the morning during these periods, which are the busiest of the year.

The new time also brings the hour for resuming work after the midday meal right in the very heat of the day, making it impossible for either man or beast to perform their labors to the best advantage. Then, again, the new time brings the hour to quit field work in the afternoon just at the time when the heat has subsided and the most efficient effort could be put forth.

There is not the slightest doubt but what by far the greater majority of the farmers are opposed to the present daylight-saving law, and the Minnesota State Union American Society of Equity respectfully requests that you do all in your power to secure the repeal of this law at an early date.

Very truly, yours, C. R. WHITAKER,
Secretary Minnesota State Union,
American Society of Equity.

Mr. CAPPER presented petitions of sundry citizens of the counties of Harvey, Chase, Marion, and Butler, and of Local Union No. 282, Amalgamated Sheet Metal Workers Union, of Pittsburg, all in the State of Kansas, praying for Government ownership of railroad, telephone, and telegraph lines, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Overbrook, Erie, Dodge City, and Kinsley, all in the State of Kansas, remonstrating against the repeal of war-time prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of Local Lodge No. 658, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, of Sheffield, Ala., setting forth its grievances relative to working conditions, etc., at nitrate plant No. 2, Muscle Shoals, Ala., which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

DEFICIENCY IN RAILROAD OPERATION.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Appropriations, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 5312) to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for carrying out the act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918, reported it without amendment.

LOAN OF TENTS.

Mr. LENROOT. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably with amendments the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 20) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan tents and other material to the State of Wisconsin for National Army Encampment to be held in Milwaukee, Wis., and I submit a report (No. 14) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were, on page 1, line 7, to strike out the words "National Army" and insert "Army of the United States"; in line 10, after the word "tents," to insert the word "and"; in the same line, following the word "cots," to strike out "mess kits, blankets, field ranges"; on page 2, line 4, to strike out the words "and utensils of all descriptions"; in line 11, to strike out the words "guarantee to" and insert in lieu thereof the word "fully"; after the word "protect," in the same line, to insert "in such manner as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War"; and in lines 13 and 14 to strike out the words "not necessarily incident to the use specified" and insert "and for its return," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized under such restrictions as are usual in such cases, without expense to the Government of the United States, to loan to the State of Wisconsin for use at the reunion encampment of the demobilized members of the Army of the United States from the State of Wisconsin, to be held in September, 1919, at Milwaukee, Wis., and for such use to deliver to said State of Wisconsin such tents and cots, such of the United States ensigns, flags belonging to the Government of the United States, as may be spared and are not in use by the Government at the time of said reunion. And also for the purpose of caring for the sick and injured on the occasion of said reunion, such hospital tents and camp appliances and other necessities, hospital furniture, stretchers, Red Cross flags and poles belonging to the Government, as may be spared and are not in use at the time of the encampment; that such property and appliances loaned to the State of Wisconsin shall be delivered at such time and place as may be agreed upon by the Secretary of War and a duly authorized officer of the State of Wisconsin: Provided, That the State of Wisconsin shall fully protect in such manner as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War the Government of the United States against any loss or damage to the property loaned under authority of this resolution and for its return.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator having the joint resolution in charge a question. I made a request a few days ago of the War Department for the use of tents for the Boy Scouts in one of the Western States. The report was submitted, as I recall, that there were no tents available in the War Department for purposes of that kind; indeed, that all the tents the department have on hand, except a few which could be sold, and which they desire to sell, were needed for the Army.

I was wondering whether the information conveyed to me was accurate and whether there are tents available for the purpose indicated in the joint resolution now under consideration.

Mr. LENROOT. I think perhaps the Senator was somewhat misinformed. The War Department now can not loan tents and equipment to any organization other than the Grand Army of the Republic and the Confederate Veterans without special authority. This encampment is to be held in September in Wisconsin. Application was made by the governor to the Secretary of War, and a letter which accompanies the report states that they will be glad to loan the tents to the State if they have authority from Congress to do so.

Mr. KING. The Senator did not quite answer my question. The information which I received in addition to that which I indicated was that there are not sufficient tents in the War Department for purposes of this kind, except some that might be sold which are not needed.

Mr. LENROOT. All that I know is what the Secretary states. This is merely an authorization. If they have not the tents, they can not be loaned. It is not a direction; it is merely discretionary.

Mr. KING. Then there is no assurance that there are tents available for this purpose?

Mr. LENROOT. No.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to loan tents and other material to the State of Wisconsin for an encampment of veterans of the Army of the United States to be held in Milwaukee, Wis."

"Motions coming over from a preceding day to discharge a committee from the further consideration of a bill, resolution, or other matter in the hands of a committee, which motions shall be debatable."

PEACE POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. STERLING submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 78), which was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the ratification of the terms of the treaty of peace, including the covenant for a league of nations, lately proposed by the allied powers and associated nations to Germany and to Austria should be on the following express conditions or reservations, to be attached to and become a part of said treaty and covenant, and not otherwise:

That the United States of America, in view of their remote situation with reference to European States or other States of the Eastern Hemisphere and their more immediate interest in the territorial integrity and free institutions of the sovereign States of the Western Hemisphere and policies concerning which and the cordial relations with which the United States will endeavor to maintain, expressly reserve to themselves the right to determine, through the Congress, the justice or expediency of any fulfillment on the part of the United States of the obligations contained in or imposed by article 10 of the covenant for a league of nations, so far as such obligations at any time apply to the situation of any State or States of the Eastern Hemisphere.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege. I send to the Secretary's desk an editorial published in a newspaper which has been sent to me by one of my constituents—an anonymous one, by the way—with this notation:

Please read this article, by one of America's most enlightened thinkers and teachers.

I ask that the editorial be printed in the RECORD, the name of no Senator except the one now having the floor to be inserted, unless by consent of the different Senators who are mentioned therein.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the article referred to will be printed in the RECORD.

The article referred to is as follows:

THE ENORMITY OF THEIR CRIME.

By Dr. Frank Crane.

When a man commits a crime he never knows what its consequences will be. They may be trivial, they may be appalling.

The universe is so complex that to throw one grain of criminal sand into its delicate machinery may bring unutterable ruin.

But there are some acts of mischief whose enormity is manifest. Among these I know of no greater than the activities of such men as Senators SHERMAN, REED, and BORAH in their desperate efforts to defeat the ratification of the league of nations by the United States.

Mr. Vanderlip, recently returning from Europe, has told us—and he is certainly an intelligent observer and of conservative temper—of the deplorable conditions in Europe, which are the aftermath of war. That Continent is completely disorganized industrially—man power has been alarmingly cut down. The men who survive do not want to work, but prefer idleness and revolt, which is the usual effect of war. Animals for farm work have been destroyed in the carnival of destruction. And Mr. Vanderlip is not pessimistic. It is the facts he brings us which are pessimistic.

Mr. Davison of the Red Cross says that we can not conceive of the horror of starvation and disease that is darkening Europe.

After war comes worse than war, even as hell follows death.

Think of the conditions in distracted Russia, in the territory of the central powers! Italy, we are told, dare not disband her army because she has no work for its men. England trembles upon the verge of revolution.

The wayfaring man, though a fool, knows this. And every human being who is capable of any cerebration at all knows that there is but one possible program that gives any promise of preventing further wars, followed by further famine, pestilence, and riot. The program is the league of nations.

Careful readers of the newspapers must know that, amid all that has been said against the league, no one has ever suggested any other way except the league of nations by which future wars can be prevented.

And yet there is a lively and determined movement on the part of certain men in the United States to defeat the league! In nothing is the utter hideousness of partisan politics more apparent than in this spectacle of men who, to gain partisan advantage, are willing to bring the human race to ruin.

Bad as this war is, all scientific thinkers are agreed that it was mild indeed compared to what the next war will be, unless by some league of nations it can be obviated.

Looking at all this, I would deliberately say that I would rather take my stand with Judas Iscariot, with Abdul the Damned, with the members of that vile court that sentenced Joan of Arc to flames, with John Wilkes Booth, or Charles J. Guiteau, than line up with a purpose so diabolical, so far-reaching in its mischievous effects as that of defeating the league of nations. For it means to put out the only light that glimmers in the darkness of the world, to wreck the only lifeboat laboring to the rescue of humanity.

Mr. SHERMAN. The substance of the article is printed on the editorial page, that all who are opposed to the league of nations are committing an enormous offense. They are classified with various historical characters from Judas Iscariot down to a number of modern assassins. Ordinarily I pay no attention to this kind of an article, but it represents a type of a certain class of critics in this country, Mr. President, and so long as it mentions myself and other Senators by name, I feel inclined to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD my reply to all of them in order to save correspondence.

The article in question is by Dr. Frank Crane. Frank Crane was once a minister of the Gospel. As such he ranked as a doctor of divinity. Abandoning the ministry, he wrote books, essays, on almost everything, raged on the lecture platform for hire, and precipitated himself into unorthodox controversy on every subject that agitated the public mind. Like a lawyer, he must be retained before he discovers the merits of his subject. He is an author belonging, among other clubs, to the Lambs' Club, in New York City, a club of authors. So long as he is a "Lamb" in good standing, I conceive it to be my duty and my privilege to shear the aforesaid lamb now, as it is early in the spring. His books, which I have had the pleasure and sometimes the pain of reading, give no promise of lighting his name down to future generations. As a chronicler of current events, it is my duty to embalm this insect in the amber of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Posterity may thereby gaze upon him properly preserved in the queen's English and visible in his natural state.

In the ex-doctor's random lambasting of everybody and whatever he chances to have his enmity directed against, he has been on all sides of most questions, and has criticized in language far from churchly many men in public and private life. He wrote a book called the "Religion of To-morrow." It suits him exactly. Most of the doctor's religion is of to-morrow rather than of to-day or of present practice. Another, two years later, entitled "Human Confession," is enough to make Rousseau wish he had never confessed anything. The same year, 1911, witnessed the birth of "God and Democracy." The good doctor thinks this is the league of nations coupled with the peace treaty, although he has never read the combination of both unless he has found it recently in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. "Just Human," in 1915, suggests plagiarism from Nietzsche. "Adventures in Common Sense" and the "Looking Glass," in 1916–17, show the utter futility of titles to mere books indicating in title or text much about their author. The whole series, as well as the author, is fitly described by the title of another book, known as "Lame and Lovely." Let the ex-doctor of divinity rest in peace under this alliterative and descriptive phrase.

Ordinarily the man who dedicates himself in earlier life to the salvation of souls and abandons that salvation later convicts himself of caring more for the emoluments of the lecture platform and syndicated sensational press articles than he does for the spiritual welfare of his brethren. Whosoever devotes his life to the spiritual service of his fellowmen and follows it faithfully to the end is the best of the human race. There is no purer, holier character; no more exalted soul hallows the earth with his unselfish presence; but the charlatan who, having left the pulpit, skulks behind it to sanctify his carnal misdeeds or give respectability to his degenerate emotions excites pity or contempt according to his mentality. One who deserts the holy calling of the church is apt to keep his sacerdotal robes well in front to cover any malevolent atrocity he commits. Many demons originally were fallen angels, all of whom in the science of demonology and in literature down to Milton's Paradise Lost and Paradise Regained prate much of their former life in the abode of the saints. So doth the good doctor. The good Crane always hangs out the "doctor" before his name to advertise his former sanctity and lend respectability to his worldly villianies. We are justified in believing the word "doctor" to refer to his former title of doctor of divinity, for no one in his right mind, after reading his books or weighing his system of morals, would ever suspect him of being a doctor of literature or anything else recognized in the world of learning.

A peculiarity of this type is their infallibility in all secular affairs. Their word must be accepted as final. A refusal consigns the recalcitrant to utter abomination and woe. It is sometimes difficult to separate the doctor's maledictions as a modern Jeremiah and seer from the plain hack writer at so much per column. The infallible Dr. Crane reverts to type in the article referred to, delivering the Senators opposing the league to a lurid inferno bounded only by his limited vocabulary and knowledge of history. Here our apprehension is aroused lest the doctor lapse into the rich expressive vernacular of the unredeemed or an apoplexy if his neurotic delirium continues. An ex-clergyman is universally allowed to possess authority to plunge his fellow men into a gulf of bottomless infamy. Having lived on familiar terms with perdition before he forsook the pulpit, because he was orthodox, even as one of the laity he still knows who ought to be delivered over to the buffetings of satan. I am content to let the versatile Crane keep company with the obsequious Taft. For our absent President they are the Timothy Crabshaw and Jeremy Diddler of his administration. A noble pair, indeed, are they. If the league be defeated, the spectacle of these two worthies weeping on each other's neck will melt a world in convulsive tears. Even the German will pause in sheltering himself behind the 14 points long enough to remark the harrowing scene.

I rejoice, Mr. President, that I can not meet the ex-doctor of divinity on his own level of epithets. His anathemas against the Senators who decline to accept without knowing the contents all coming from Paris via the President and Col. House neither convince nor terrify. His articles so bristle with language permissible only to a reformed clergyman that I forbear quotations. It is sufficient to say that death, hades, oblivion, the person totally void of understanding designated by a short Middle English word, hideous partisanship, treason, and as many unsavory characters as he can ransack from his memory, ranging from Judas Iscariot to several well-known modern assassins have honorable mention over such Senators. I shall await further developments with a mild degree of curiosity tempered with anxiety for the reverend doctor's health, because the furious Crane and I were once neighbors when in his more godly days he occupied a Chicago pulpit. Chicago was too slow for the doctor. He emigrated to the East where social relaxation consequent on a more Bohemian life of letters and berating chosen sinners is more liberal. A habitat where garments are changed oftener before taking nourishment appeals to the doctor. Since he separated himself from holy orders we have been going in opposite directions at a high rate of speed. Because of parliamentary rules insisted on in this body I am unable to say which way the doctor is headed or his ultimate destination, to which I earnestly exhort him to go. [Laughter.]

CONSTRUCTION OF FOREIGN SHIPS IN AMERICAN YARDS.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Calendar No. 9, being Senate bill 1274. This is a bill which passed the Senate at the last session. Under the law as it now exists it is unlawful to construct or to enter into a contract for the construction of a ship for foreign account without permission of the Shipping Board or of the President. The Committee on Commerce have gone into the matter very thoroughly, and have reported this bill. The administration has no objection to it, and the Shipping Board has gone as far as it can by issuing an order that any such contract shall now be approved immediately upon presentation. This bill simply, in a legislative way, removes the legislative restrictions making such action unlawful. I hope the Senate will favorably act upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1274) making it unnecessary to secure permits from the United States Shipping Board for the construction of ships in American shipyards for foreign account, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, in line 6, after the word "shipyards," to insert "except for alien enemies or alien enemy countries," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act it shall not be necessary to secure a permit from any governmental agency to enter into a contract for the construction of ships for foreign account in American shipyards, except for alien enemies or alien enemy countries.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I do not rise to oppose the bill, but, on the contrary, am in favor of it. I wish simply to observe that every country in the world, I believe, is limiting the construction of ships in their own shipyards to their own people or subjecting it to some control by some agency of the respective governments. I think it was good policy for us to have legislated as we did originally on this subject and leave this matter somewhat in the control of the Shipping Board, because of the fact that we needed all of our resources, all of our labor, and all of our material in the construction of ships for the Government and for our own people. I think now we have the opportunity of establishing the industry of shipbuilding in this country permanently and on a scale heretofore unknown, and that throwing open the American yards, which are greater in number and contain more shipways than will be needed for Government work and enabling them to take contracts for foreign account as well as for domestic account, is a wise thing to do. That is the purpose of the proposed legislation. The effect of it will be no longer to require that any proposals or contracts of that sort will be submitted to any agency of the Government, but that the yards will be free to make such contracts as they may wish to make on such terms as they can best obtain. It is somewhat a change of policy, but, under present circumstances, I believe that it is perhaps the wise thing to do.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill making it unnecessary to secure permits from any governmental agency for the construction of ships in American shipyards for foreign account, except for alien enemies or alien enemy countries."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. CUMMINS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 641, the unfinished business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 641) to amend section 10 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] will not press his amendment. There is this distinction between the interstate rates and the intrastate rates which are in existence: Interstate rates are created by Federal authority, and no one, I think, will claim that those rates do not continue until they are changed by Federal authority. As to the intrastate rates which existed before the war, many of them were created by statute and others pursuant to statutory authority. I believe there are some 10 or 12 States which have 2-cent passenger rates. Now, whatever may be said about the increase of rates, it would be absolutely disastrous for the Federal Government automatically to have such rates come into existence when this bill is enacted into law.

Does the Senator realize the condition of the railroads today? I am speaking as a friend of local administration in the States. I believe in maintaining local administration, for I do not believe that people should be required to come to Washington to settle all these questions of police regulations applying to the railroads in the various States. If the railroads are turned back to their private owners in their present condition, it is a conservative estimate that more than half of them will be in the hands of receivers within 60 days, involving more than ten billions of property. Such a disaster should be prevented if possible. Permit me to remind the Senator of the earnings of the railroads to-day in the hands of the Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me there?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. The intrastate rates are comparatively a small portion of the entire freight rates of the income of the railroads. That is true, is it not? They are comparatively small, about 10 per cent. Then, if it is going to bring calamity to the railroads to restore this 10 per cent at this time, why does the Senator favor the bill for restoring 90 per cent to the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. KELLOGG. We do not propose to restore any rates by this legislation.

Mr. McKELLAR. But we are restoring the right of the Interstate Commerce Commission over freight rates that it had exercised before the war measure which turned the railroads over to the Government.

Mr. KELLOGG. No; we are simply transferring the power from one Federal agency or authority to another. The interstate rates already established do not require any affirmative action of the commission to continue them. They continue as a matter of law until the Interstate Commerce Commission changes them.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Was it the opinion of the Railroad Administration or its representatives who came before the committee that the administration would be helped by this transfer of authority over rates to the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. KELLOGG. No one representing the Railroad Administration appeared before the committee on this particular question during the last hearing.

Mr. McKELLAR. There were no hearings on this bill.

Mr. KELLOGG. Hearings were held, of course, during the last session of Congress.

Mr. McKELLAR. Do I understand that the committee did not have representatives of the Railroad Administration before it?

Mr. KELLOGG. During the previous session, but not during the present session.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then the committee did not have the Railroad Administration before it on this particular question of restoring the power over rates to the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. KELLOGG. Not on that question alone.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the Senator from Tennessee can find no satisfaction in that, because the predecessor of the present Director General was before the committee on this identical bill, and I inquired of him especially in respect to it, and the matter was very fairly developed. To be perfectly candid, the former Director General was very much opposed to the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is the point I was trying to bring out. Why was the Director General opposed to the bill?

Mr. CUMMINS. He was opposed to withdrawing from himself any power whatever.

Mr. KELLOGG. I misunderstood the Senator from Tennessee. I thought he referred to hearings during the last week.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; we have had no hearings in the last week or 10 days.

Mr. McKELLAR. The reason I asked the question was because the Senator from Minnesota is arguing the matter here in behalf of the Railroad Administration, and I thought perhaps he was speaking without full knowledge of what had actually taken place. That was the reason of my calling his attention to it.

Mr. KELLOGG. I was referring to the last week.

Here is another situation: Suppose the freight rates which were established by statute prior to the war and Federal administration were automatically effective during the period of Government possession and control. The railroads can not bring a suit to set aside those statutes or orders on the ground that they confiscate their property under the Constitution of the United States, because their property is in the hands of the Government, and they are not interested in the earnings, the Government alone being concerned. Shall we force the passage of a bill restoring State rates and force the Federal Government to sue a State to set aside rates? It can not be done. For the short time the railroads are to remain under Government control and management it is my view that the Government through some agency should have complete control. I am not arguing as to what may happen when the railroads are returned to their owners. Then, of course, the companies may resort to the courts for relief and protection.

The present condition of the railroads in this country is, I think, rather appalling. The rates have been raised substantially 25 per cent, yielding in revenue between $900,000,000 and $1,000,000,000 a year, which has all been absorbed, and more, too, simply to meet wage demands, to say nothing about other increases in operating expenses. During the year 1917 the Government guaranty was approximately $900,000,000 to all of the class 1 railroads in the United States, being the average of the preceding three years' earnings; but in 1918 the railroads failed to earn that guaranty, suffering a deficit between $225,000,000 and $250,000,000, and during the last four months they have lost $250,000,000 more.

That is not all. I have here a quotation from a letter by Mr. Prouty, the accounting officer of the Railroad Administration, written to the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee, in which he says:

> If the result of the first three months of the present year be taken as an index, the Government will not earn what it would be paying for the use of these properties by from $500,000,000 to $800,000,000 in 1919.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator if the Railroad Administration does not feel that its revenues will be decreased with the passage of this bill unamended? In other words, if, by the passage of this bill, the right to control rates is restored to the Interstate Commerce Commission, will that not take away from the Director General of Railroads the right to fix rates and thereby decrease the revenues of the Government in the operation of the railroads during the remainder of this year? Is not that their contention?

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not think so.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does not the Senator think that that would be the legitimate effect of the passage of this bill?

Mr. KELLOGG. Not at all. I can not conceive that the Interstate Commerce Commission or any intelligent man, in view of the present operating expenses of the Railroad Administration, could for a moment think of reducing rates; but the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee automatically puts in force a number of statutes which the States might not pass now—I presume that they would not—but which are already in existence; that is the trouble.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why does the Railroad Administration not approve of this bill as it is written, without amendment?

Mr. KELLOGG. I presume the Railroad Administration would much prefer—I think that is their position—to have the entire power in the hands of the Director General. I wish to say frankly to the Senator from Tennessee that during the remainder of the Government administration of the railroads I for one am willing to leave it there; but there has been a great deal of complaint about the relative adjustment of rates, much more than there has been with regard to the amount of the rates; and it is impossible for one man to adjust all of these rates without the aid of a commission whose long experience and knowledge enable it to settle these differences.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator yield right there?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then, if the Senator's reasoning is correct in that respect, ought we not to have the advantage of the various State commissions in order to adjust rates?

Mr. KELLOGG. The objection is not interposed to the State commissions, but the Senator proposes automatically to cause a reduction of rates all over the country in accordance with statutes and orders which now exist, and the Railroad Administration, in behalf of the United States Government, will be compelled to ask the legislatures of the various States to repeal their laws and the commissions to change their orders.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee whether he has any reason to believe that the present Director General is opposed to this bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have never talked to him about the matter at all, but I can easily see that he would object to the delegation of this authority to some commission which may regulate the rates so that his administration would not receive as much revenue from the operation of the railroads while he has charge of them. I imagine, without knowing, for I have never talked with him or with anyone else about it, that he feels that he can not make as much revenue if the right to regulate 90 per cent of the rates of this country is taken away from him.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee knows, I presume, that the Interstate Commerce Commission has the right to regulate rates. That right never was taken away from it.

Mr. McKELLAR. It has the right to regulate rates, but it has not the right to initiate rates. The Director General has, under the present law, the right to initiate rates; and that means to make them higher when he wants to do so; and he has done so time and again.

Mr. CUMMINS. And he will have the same right under this bill if it becomes a law.

Mr. McKELLAR. But the rates so fixed will be subject to the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission; otherwise there would be no reason for passing this measure.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is to say, the Interstate Commerce Commission would have the right to suspend the rates before they go into force.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course.

Mr. CUMMINS. Had the Senator from Tennessee been here yesterday when the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and myself were discussing the matter, he would have heard what I said with regard to my own conversation with the present Director General about this bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. I did not hear the Senator yesterday, and will be glad to hear him now.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no reason to believe that he is opposed to the bill. He has not made any objection to it, so far as I know. If the Senator from Minnesota will permit me a word further, the only question the Director General ever asked me about the bill, although he knew I was the author of it and knew I was pressing it, was this: "Do you intend to try to take away from the President the right to control intrastate rates?" I told him there was no such purpose on my part, and that seemed to be entirely satisfactory to him.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, just a word further about the expenses of the railroads. It is not alone the increase in wages which has so greatly increased operating expenses; it is because of the increase in nearly every item under the interstate commerce classification of expenses of the railroad companies. According to the report of Mr. Hines, filed with the committee in January, 1919, there were 139,846, or substantially 140,000, more railroad employees, transacting less business, than there were in December, 1917, under private management; and, as nearly as one can determine, that means $210,000,000, which is 3 per cent on every dollar of capital stock of all the railroads in the United States.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield further to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no doubt that the Senator's figures are accurate, but I am wondering why the committee does not bring in a bill here to restore the railroads to their owners and let us be done with the matter. I think it ought to be done. I wish to vote for a bill that will restore the railroads to private ownership.

Mr. KELLOGG. I shall tell the Senator why the committee has not done it. The committee sat nearly every day for two months during the last session of Congress hearing the testimony of railway representatives, security holders, representatives of communities, traffic associations, farmers, labor associations, and all classes of associations entitled to be heard. Full hearings were given. The committee has within a few days taken up the subject. Does the Senator realize the tremendous importance and character of such legislation—that if the railroads were turned back as we turned back the telephone companies, half of them or more would be in the hands of receivers within 60 days? Such a course is impossible. It would be a most serious public offense to wreck transportation systems by any such act.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator think that the telegraph and telephone companies are going into the hands of receivers because they are turned back?

Mr. KELLOGG. No. They have not suffered as the railroads have suffered. Their operating expenses have not been increased to any such extent as those of the railway lines.

I did not intend to discuss this question at this time, but I should like to have the Senate understand the condition of the railroads of the United States. I am having compiled a statement showing not what the Government paid them but the actual earnings during 1918 and during the last three or four months. Let me remind the Senator of a few of such cases; and I shall not take extreme cases.

I will take first the Pennsylvania Railroad system, which, I think, no one will claim is excessively capitalized and which I think everyone will admit has always been a fairly model railroad.

The Government's guaranty to the Pennsylvania system for 1918 was $65,992,740. The Pennsylvania Railroad actually earned $22,428,838, and it lacked $31,756,909 of earning its ordinary dividend of 5 per cent.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does not the Senator think that that affords a very cogent reason why the Government should turn over these railroads to their owners?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes, it does, just as soon as we can pass legislation which will provide for their proper control.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield for a question.

Mr. TRAMMELL. What is the basis upon which that remuneration is determined?

Mr. KELLOGG. It was the average three-year earnings preceding the war, which was fixed by Congress as the standard return.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I knew that that was the maximum amount authorized by the act of Congress, but I did not know whether or not the Director General had exercised the full maximum privilege.

Mr. KELLOGG. He has.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Is the Senator in possession of information as to what percentage that will amount to upon the investment?

Mr. KELLOGG. I will give the Senator the percentage. It was only a little more than the interest upon the Pennsylvania Railroad Co.'s bonds, which do not amount to a third of the value of the property; and it was about, as I remember, 2 per cent on its total property value.

I also have the Pennsylvania Railroad Co.'s earnings for the year and three months of Government control. The total deficit of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. during that time was $39,000,000, and its net operating income for 1918 was less than 2 per cent of its total property investment. If the Pennsylvania Railroad was turned back under those conditions, it could not pay the interest on its bonds which are outstanding, and no one questions that those bonds equal not more than 33⅓ per cent of the value of the property.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator think the Government ought to continue to make up this deficit, or does he think that the Government should interpose and aid the Pennsylvania Railroad in any way in earning full interest on its bonds and dividends on its stock?

Mr. KELLOGG. Who has caused this deficit? Not the Pennsylvania Railroad, but the Government. When possession of the roads was assumed by the Government the Pennsylvania Railroad was earning its interest and over 5 per cent upon its stock. The Government has increased its operating expenses, which are a charge ahead of its mortgage, so that it can not recover; and the Government has no right to take over the property of a railroad company, increase its operating expenses, make it bankrupt, and then discard it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I take it that there is no difference of opinion about the deficit that has already been caused by Government operation; but is there any reason why the Government should continue in the future to guarantee to the Pennsylvania Railroad that it shall earn the interest on its bonds and dividends on its stock? Does the Senator take that position?

Mr. KELLOGG. No; I am not in favor of any such Government guaranty. The Government's guaranty ceases when the railroads are turned back, as soon as we can draft proper legislation; but I desire in a few instances to remind the Senator of the condition which would exist if these railroads, after the Government has increased their operating expenses to such an abnormal extent, were returned. If we should say, "You can take your property and take care of it," it would not only be bad judgment, ruinous to the finances of the country, but it would be dishonest. No private individual would think of doing such a thing, and the Government will not think of doing it.

Take the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad, a great system in my section, which for many years was considered one of the safest and best-managed railroads in the country. Its average earnings for the three years preceding the war were $27,594,551. That is its contract with the Government. It actually earned, under the operating expenses imposed upon it by the Government, $3,643,192, and its bond interest was over $17,000,000. It earned practically nothing on its bond interest.

Take the Chicago & North Western. The Chicago & North Western Railroad is one of the oldest and one of the best-managed and lowest-capitalized railroads in this country. The present head of that company—I say "head of the company"; he is now the head of the corporation, but he has not anything to do with Government management—Mr. Marvin Hughitt, has been president of the Chicago & North Western Railroad for more than 40 years. I have known him intimately during that time. No one ever claimed that that company had any watered stock or that it was not honestly and well managed; and now let us look at it. Its dividends are moderate. It lacked $8,340,628 of earning its dividends last year. Its total Government guaranty was $23,201,016. It actually earned about half that—$12,441,437—and it is doubtful if the North Western Road at its present rate of earnings could pay the interest on its bonded indebtedness if it were relinquished, because its condition in the last four months is worse than it was during last year.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry there, just for information?

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Is the deplorable condition of these roads the result of the diversion of traffic from them to other systems, or is it largely due to the increased expenses of operation owing to mismanagement or maladministration or incompetency, or to what would the Senator attribute this condition?

Mr. KELLOGG. I attribute it principally to the enormous increase of operating expenses in all branches of the administration, increase of compensation of employees, increase of expenses of material and supplies, increase in the number of the employees, and—a thing which I believe to be inevitable—a decrease in efficiency due to Government operation.

I stated when the bill was before the Senate in February, 1918, that there was no necessity for assuming control of the railroads of this country; that the administration of the railroad officials during eight or nine months of the war in 1917 had been efficient, and had enormously increased transportation without increasing the cost.

You can not take a great business such as involves the railroads of this country and make it prosperous and efficient unless you have behind it the enterprise, the incentive, and the ingenuity of men. I prefer no charges against any of the gentlemen who are operating these roads on behalf of the Government. The system is inefficient and impossible. The Government has increased and doubled the operating expenses; and while the rates have been increased, they have been wholly inadequate to meet the enormous operating expenses. There are only two courses open to Congress. The Congress must consider the whole subject, and return the railroads under a system of strict Federal control, which I am in favor of, which will permit them to benefit by the competitive and individual enterprise of the American people, or the Government must perpetuate the inefficiency by purchasing the roads and meeting the deficits, which it alone could do. I am in favor of strict Government control, particularly with regard to the issuance of stocks and securities, and I also favor giving the commission the sole power to fix minimum as well as maximum rates, preserving, however, the competitive system of operation, and infusing railroad management with the enterprise and ingenuity of the American people.

I also believe in local administration, but I ask the Senator to give the Congress an opportunity to solve the most difficult financial problem that ever confronted the American people, which has been created by the inordinate desire of the Federal Administration to control the business of the country, upon the theory that Government control transcends private management, which is a fallacy.

I shall not consider the condition of all the companies. I do not know whether there has been favoritism shown or not. The transcontinental railroads, the Union Pacific and the Santa Fe and some of the other companies, have shown better results, but a great many of the large and well-managed railroads of the United States are not earning to-day, under the present Government rate of expenses, their interest, or any more than their fixed charges. For instance, the New Haven Railroad, without paying a dollar of dividends, last year lacked $7,521,859 in its earnings to cover operating expenses and interest on its bonds and fixed charges. No one claims that that road is bonded for its value.

I do not believe that it serves the interests of the American people to have a great Government bureau in Washington supervising the railroads of this country. I am in entire harmony with the views of the chairman as he expressed them yesterday. The Federal Government must have control of the interstate rates, and I can see no objection to that control being placed in the hands of a commission which knows the conditions as they exist. I am willing to leave it where it is.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think that the passage of this bill may delay somewhat action by the committee of which he is a member in restoring the railroads to private ownership, or at least in adopting some different and better plan of management and control than that which now prevails?

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not see how it can affect it in the least, one way or the other.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, with the Senator's permission I will state that the committee of which I am chairman will work every available hour until it is able to present to the Senate a plan of readjustment and reorganization which it believes will accomplish the purposes which the American people so sincerely want.

Mr. KING. I am sure, if the Senator will pardon me, that he and his committee will be doing a great public service, and none greater can be done at the present time.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Utah, I hope, will remember this: Including the plans put before the committee and those that have been submitted to me personally, I have had more than 30 distinct and complete plans for the readjustment of the relations between the Government and the railroads, or the reorganization which it is thought must be made.

Mr. KING. I have no doubt that every crank and faddist in the country is here to advise the committee.

Mr. WATSON. Yes; but if the Senator will permit me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. KELLOGG. I do.

Mr. WATSON. Not only the cranks and the faddists, but men engaged in the railroad business, railroad presidents, railroad managers, men connected with the Railroad Administration, men representing every phase of railroad activity, have different plans for the reorganization of the service. We all understand that it would be what I consider the very height of folly to cast these railroads back without suitable legislation, because, as the Senator has already said, it would undoubtedly throw 50 per cent of the railroads of the United States into the hands of a receiver within 60 days, and no power could prevent the precipitation of a panic in the United States such as has not cursed this country for many years in the past; and, therefore, there must be wise and salutary legislation before this step can be taken. Under these circumstances, as the Senator has so well said, it is the duty of this committee to sit day after day, until to the best of our knowledge and ability this question shall have been solved, and until we shall have presented to this body the result of that deliberation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield for a question.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will yield for that purpose, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I can understand the difficulties of this situation, and I can understand the great amount of work that it will require and the very considerable time that will have to be given to it, so that the railroads may be retransferred in a fair and just and equitable way, taking into consideration their own interests and the local and all other interests; but can the Senator from Iowa, the chairman of the committee, inform us about when we may expect action by the committee on the matter of restoring the railroads to their owners?

Mr. CUMMINS. I can not with any accuracy, Mr. President. I shall be very much disappointed if we are not able to present a plan or present the legislation that in our view will accomplish the purpose early enough to have it acted upon during the present year.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Chicago Great Western Railroad Co., with a line about 1,500 miles in length, extending west from Chicago, has a bonded indebtedness, as I remember, of about $25,000 a mile. Its total net earnings last year under the Railroad Administration were $21,457. I understand that the president of the road claims that it was $61,000, which yields practically nothing on its bonds. That is a result of mortgaging it with enormous operating expenses.

[At this point Mr. KELLOGG yielded the floor for the day.]

Thursday, June 12, 1919.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, when the Senate adjourned last evening I had practically completed the remarks I intended to make upon this bill. I have, however, been requested to place in the RECORD the statements showing actual earnings of several companies to which I referred yesterday, which contain evidence that many of the leading conservative railroads of this country are not earning to-day the interest on their bonded indebtedness, without regard to the dividends which they have paid for many years.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. Has the Senator any figures showing how much the Railroad Administration would lose if the regulation of intrastate rates were restored to State control?

Mr. KELLOGG. I have not the figures.

Mr. McKELLAR. Has the Senator any view about how much would be lost? It was stated here yesterday by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] that there would be a very great loss to the Railroad Administration if the regulation of intrastate rates were restored to State control; and I was wondering if the Senator had the figures, or anything approximating them.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. KELLOGG. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no positive or definite information upon that point, but I think I can suggest an estimate that will be fairly accurate. I believe upon the whole the revenues of the railroads derived from intrastate business are about one-fifth of the entire revenues. I state that from the merest recollection, because I have not examined the reports recently upon that point. If that be true, it will work out in this way:

In the year 1918, the first year of Federal control, the railroads earned four billions nearly nine hundred millions of dollars. If one-fifth of those revenues were derived from what is called intrastate traffic, the result would be that about a billion dollars came from that source. If we may assume that the increases that were made by the Director General averaged 20 per cent upon the State rates as well as upon the interstate rates, the amount of the increase upon State rates would be in the neighborhood of $200,000,000; and if the State rates were restored immediately upon the passage of this bill, the Government would lose in revenue something like $200,000,000 per year. In view of the facts which are now being stated by the Senator from Minnesota, and which I outlined yesterday—namely, that we lost in 1918 $240,000,000, and that we are losing now at the rate of more than $700,000,000 per year—the effect upon the Treasury of the United States of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee can be readily seen.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Iowa for that statement. I wish to remind the Senate that owing to the enormous increase of operating expenses the Government is now losing anywhere from five to eight hundred million dollars per year, as estimated by the expert of the Railroad Administration, Mr. Prouty; but that is not the most serious phase of the question. I suppose the taxpayers of the country must meet the deficit, but if you turn the railroads back—and they must be returned soon; the President advises the 1st of January—you return them mortgaged with operating expenses which the companies are absolutely incapable of liquidating. Nothing is more difficult to reduce than the operating expenses of a railroad, which must be met before they can pay their interest; and the country can not afford to revise those rates during the period of Government operation.

As I stated yesterday, when the Pennsylvania Railroad and the Chicago & North Western Railroad—undercapitalized, conservatively managed—would be compelled to default on their interest if they were turned back to-day, the Congress and the country ought to realize the calamitous results of Government operation. This Congress has no more difficult question to-day to solve among all its vast economic problems than that involving the return of the railroads to their owners and again enlisting the enterprise, ingenuity, and initiative of American men and averting total bankruptcy and disaster. We must not overlook the fact that railroad bonds—I mean first-class, prior-lien bonds—which for years had been the best security in this country, are held by the hundreds of millions by savings banks—in the case of the savings banks of Connecticut 32 per cent are railroad securities—and by insurance and trust companies, in which all the people are interested. The Comptroller of the Currency has been compelled to permit national banks to list the bonds regardless of the market quotations.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes.

Mr. SHEPPARD. If the situation is so serious, why do you attempt to disarrange it by making such a fundamental change as that contemplated in this bill?

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not think this bill makes any particular change.

Mr. SHEPPARD. You deprive the Railroad Administration of its authority over rate making.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am perfectly willing to leave it where it is. I should be very glad to do so, I will say to the Senator. I am not anxious to have it changed, but I do not want it made any worse, and I want the Senate to understand and the people to understand the problem which has developed from the railroad situation in this country. The railroads must be placed where they can earn a fair income on their value, obtain money enough to furnish satisfactory transportation, make extensions and betterments sufficient to meet the demands of this country, or our commerce will suffer as a consequence.

The railroads are the arteries which carry the lifeblood of our commerce, and nothing is more important than that we adopt a policy which is wise and conservative and adequate for the needs of the country.

Let us consider the Rock Island, which was considered one of the overcapitalized lines; but it has been reorganized and its capitalization reduced so that to-day it is conservative and a good railroad system. Its guaranty by the Government was $15,883,891 for the year 1918. It actually earned only $9,118,405, which about equals the interest on its bonds, to say nothing of interest on the unfunded debt, rentals for leased properties, or dividends. No one will claim that the Rock Island road's value is represented by its bonds. It earned a little more than half of its guaranty.

The Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis & Omaha is one of the very best lines of railroad in my section. Its guaranty for 1918 was $4,934,790, its actual earnings $2,624,720, and with its income from sources other than transportation it earned only $2,460,040. Its bond interest alone was $2,260,475, approximating the amount of its earnings, with no dividends; and that road has paid 5 or 6 per cent dividends since I can remember.

The same is true of the Minneapolis, St. Paul & Sault Ste. Marie.

I ask permission, without further comment, to have these statements printed in the RECORD at the end of my remarks. [See Appendix A.]

As I said yesterday, the rates have been increased about 25 per cent and with no particular increase in the business. Class 1 roads earned approximately $900,000,000 more in 1918 than they earned in 1917 under private management, while the actual net earning was about $300,000,000 less. There is a change of over twelve hundred million dollars in the operation of railroads whose gross earnings approximated $5,000,000,000.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly.

Mr. KING. The amount stated by the Senator as being the increased earnings, I suppose, was the gross earnings?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes; the gross earnings.

Mr. KING. And they were based entirely upon the increase in rates and business.

Mr. KELLOGG. There was not much increase in business in 1918. In fact, the business is less now than it was in 1917.

Mr. KING. Was there anything before the committee to indicate whether or not the Railroad Administration is now routing freight over certain favored lines, if I may be permitted that expression, with an apparent discrimination against other lines?

Mr. KELLOGG. No; there was no testimony to that effect before the committee. As I said yesterday there are some roads that have not suffered so much. The roads generally in the southern district south of the Ohio River, as well as some of the transcontinental roads in the West, have done very well, but in districts where traffic is heavy, where the population is most dense, where you would expect the roads with increased business to have improved earnings, their operating expenses have so enormously increased that their actual earnings have very greatly decreased, and such is their present condition that if they were turned back to-day many of them, as I said before, would go into a receiver's hands.

I also ask permission to print at the end of my remarks a condensed statement of the operation of all class 1 railroads in 1918, 1917, and 1916. It is a very brief statement, also covering the months of January, February, and March, and the three months were condensed in one statement. Senators will there have a general sketch of the condition of the railroads in the country.

It stands to reason that something must be done. The Government has no right to take over a railroad or any other public utility, and under the guise of its war power to so increase its operating expenses as to destroy its property and earning capacity and then return it to its owner without providing a corresponding increase of income.

[1] Deficit.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], I agree that this legislation might very well have awaited a report by the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate upon the general subject disposing of the railroad question as a whole. One of the primary purposes of the pending bill is to restore to the Interstate Commerce Commission control of the adjustment of rates, charges, fares, and classifications affecting interstate commerce.

The question asked by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] during the remarks of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] is pertinent. The Senator from Texas inquired if it is dangerous to restore to State instrumentalities control of intrastate rates why is it not also dangerous, in view of all the existing circumstances, to restore to the Interstate Commerce Commission control of rates affecting interstate commerce? I think I can answer that question to the entire satisfaction of the Senator from Texas.

In the first place, Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] will automatically put into operation prewar rates, both as to passengers and freight affecting intrastate commerce. The provision in the pending bill will not automatically restore prewar rates in interstate commerce. It will leave in effect the rates that have been established by the Federal administration touching interstate commerce, and they can only be reduced or modified in the manner required by the interstate commerce law, and with the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

It requires no argument to emphasize the importance of this distinction. Every Senator knows that prior to Federal control there were in effect as many various standards respecting intrastate rates as there are States. There were a number of laws fixing passenger rates at 2 cents per mile These will become effective if the pending amendment is agreed to. The Federal Administration of Railroads caused an increase in both interstate rates and intrastate rates, as stated by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], approximating 20 per cent. The effect of the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee then will be to leave in operation, for the present, at least, all increases of rates relating to interstate commerce, and to repeal all increases relating to intrastate rates.

Let us look for a moment into the final result of such legislation. It is admitted that existing rates are barely adequate to meet the expenses incident to railroad operation under Federal control. If we adopt the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee resulting in an immediate reduction in railroad revenues arising from intrastate rates to an amount approximating $200,000,000, as estimated by the Senator from Iowa—which estimate I believe to be as nearly correct as any which the figures available will sustain—that action will make it necessary to further increase interstate rates in order to meet the additional deficit which will thus be caused by reducing the revenues on intrastate commerce. So it is perfectly clear that intrastate rates would be reduced approximately 20 per cent by the adoption of this amendment, whereas the rates on interstate commerce would not be reduced at all. The disproportion which will arise between interstate commerce revenues and intrastate revenues will be approximately $200,000,000.

There is another reason, though, which I will state in answer to the question of the Senator from Texas, why no serious detriment can result from the enactment of the pending bill, in so far as it relates to restoration of control to the Intersate Commerce Commission over rates on interstate fares and freights. As a matter of fact, and I think this is the statement made by the Senator from Iowa in his opening discussion of this bill, the Railroad Administration is now in most instances using the Interstate Commerce Commission as its instrumentality for determining interstate questions of the character involved in the provision pending before the Senate, and the passage of the bill will not bring about any very great change in the system that is now prevailing. The benefit that is alleged to accrue from it will be to restore to the legally constituted tribunal, familiar with questions of the character to be determined growing out of interstate commerce, its legal and complete control over those questions. It will also secure to complaining shippers prompt hearings before a tribunal especially qualified to determine their rights.

Mr. SHEPPARD. May I ask the Senator a question at that point?

Mr. ROBINSON. With pleasure.

Mr. SHEPPARD. What agency does the United States Railroad Administration make use of in the matter of intrastate rates at present?

Mr. ROBINSON. My information is that it has boards or committees appointed to make summary investigations of questions affecting intrastate rates, and these committees determine those questions in a somewhat summary manner.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I should like to say to the Senator that the amendment which I introduced did not contemplate the restoration of prewar intrastate rates at this time, but applied simply to the authority of the State commissions. That amendment I withdrew because it opened up too large a subject for disposition at this time.

Mr. ROBINSON. In that respect, if the amendment of the Senator from Texas was confined to that issue alone, it is less objectionable than the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], because it is perfectly clear that rates on intrastate freights which might have been fair and just in the prewar period and during the period when the State commissions had the power to exercise their authority would not be right now. Everyone knows that along with the general increase in the prices of nearly all commodities has come an increased cost in the operation of railroads, due principally to two general circumstances—first, enormous increase in wages and, second, great increases in the cost of materials. It was principally to meet those two increased expenditures that the Railroad Administration found it imperative to raise both interstate rates and intrastate rates, and it would have been unfair and inequitable to have placed the whole burden on interstate commerce.

If you assume, for the sake of argument, that the proportion of revenues raised on interstate commerce and on intrastate commerce prior to Federal control was approximately just, and that as a result of increased expenses in the operation and maintenance of railroads rates had to be increased, innumerable inequities would arise from placing the whole burden of that increase on one branch of commerce. That is undoubtedly the theory upon which the Railroad Administration has acted in advancing both the interstate and intrastate rates. It could not have acted on any other theory. You may admit for the sake of argument that, as a result of adjustments that have taken place under this power during Federal control, incongruities have arisen and injustice has been done in some instances, but an irreparable injury will be done not only to the commerce of the country but to the Government itself, to the people as a whole, and to the railroads, if this amendment prevails.

It would be impossible for me, without giving careful attention to the language in which to express my thoughts, to outline to the Senate the many ways in which confusion will arise if this amendment is agreed to. It has been stated on the floor of the Senate that during the period of Federal control one State has reduced intrastate rates to a point approximately one-half of what they were before the Federal Government took charge of the railroads. Thus it would not only result that the pre-war rates as to intrastate commerce would go into effect but also rates of the character I have just described, those which I think every Senator will agree with me must be unreasonably low. Nothing else could result from reductions like that to which I have just referred, where a State is said to have reduced the rates approximately one-half below what they were when the war began.

A great deal has been said during the consideration of this question as to the importance of maintaining railroad credit, and as to the effect of increasing or reducing rates on railroad securities. There has been propaganda designed to create a feeling throughout the country that rates now taken as a whole are inadequate to meet the requirements of justice. I express no opinion concerning the merits of that contention. The subject of rate making, considered in its connection with its effect on railroad securities, considered with regard to its relation to future conditions, is too complicated to be determined by the simple expression of an opinion concerning the adequacy of given rate schedules.

A member of the Interstate Commerce Commission, Mr. McChord, has issued a statement containing information of value concerning the subject of railroad earnings, and also suggesting facts of great importance in their bearing on the railroad problem as a whole, and I am going to ask to insert that statement in the RECORD as reflecting, in part, the contrary theory to that asserted by those who insist that the rates must be further increased, or that the Government must guarantee a fixed return on railroad investments to avert financial disaster. I will insert that statement in the RECORD in connection with the remarks that I am now making, unless there is objection to that course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCCUMBER in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement referred to is as follows:

The importance of adequate and efficient transportation systems in this country can not well be overestimated. The framing of laws that shall give expression to a national policy of regulation of railroad and water transportation for the future involves questions which affect immense property interests, as well, to a large extent, the welfare of the people as a whole.

It is apparent that some of the so-called problems have been needlessly magnified. After all, this is not entirely a new or novel phase of legislative action. For more than 30 years the common carriers of the country by railroad have been operating under more or less effective Federal and State control. The record has been made and is available for use and guidance at this time. Many of the propositions that will be presented should no longer be subject to controversy. They have become settled through court construction or through recognition of their efficacy by carriers, shippers, and the public. There is a disposition upon the part of some people to tear up by the roots the existing system of regulation, and to call for the framing of an entirely new statute, based largely upon new and untried theories. This would be a long step backward, and no warrant can be found for such a radical change, judging from results that have flown from the regulation we have had. The good in existing laws should be preserved, and where necessary they should be bolstered and reinforced by amendment or addition. Not less but more efficient regulation is the demand that experience dictates. In order that the public should realize the best results from consistent and just regulation, and in order that common carriers may be in a situation to secure to themselves the benefits of such regulation, the railroads, as determined by the President, should be returned to their owners by January 1 next.

It has been repeatedly stated by officials high in railway councils that if the railroad managers were left to themselves they could and would demonstrate their ability to handle and transport the commerce of the country in an efficient and satisfactory manner. When the officials return to duty the roads will have full opportunity to demonstrate their ability to perform as they promise.

My position with respect to this should not be misunderstood. From the very best study I have been able to give the subject, I am firmly of opinion that what I advocate is in the best interest of the public and the carriers. I am not an unalterable opponent of Government ownership if that becomes necessary and is safeguarded by proper legislation. There might be greater evils attendant upon the settlement of the railroad problem than Government ownership. That alternative we can resort to if in the future it becomes imperative. What I do believe is that just now is a very inopportune time to enter upon so stupendous an undertaking. I read that the indebtedness of this country, in part as a result of the war, will approximate $30,000,000,000. The value of the railroads of the country as computed by them is about $18,000,000,000. Add to this what the Government is now obligated to pay the railroads under the Federal-control act, in order that they shall be restored to their owners in as good physical and financial condition as when taken over, a conservative estimate is that the total cost of the transportation systems of the country would not be less than $20,000,000,000. An issue of bonds to pay for the railroads in that sum would increase the national debt to about $50,000,000,000, or over $450 for every man, woman, and child now resident in this country, assuming the population to be 110,000,000. At 4½ per cent interest the annual charge on the total indebtedness would be $2,125,000,000, or about $20 per year for each resident. No one should at such a time as this, when the business and industrial interests are endeavoring to resume business and production on a peace basis, advocate national expenditures on so stupendous a scale. Of course, the Government would operate the roads with no purpose of securing a profit, else the real incentive to such ownership would disappear. Under Government ownership the public must pay the bills the same as under private ownership. It is to be remembered that not all the railroads of the country have paid their owners a return on investment. Prof. F. W. Taussig, in Principles of Economics, second volume, page 364, in discussing some of the difficulties of Government ownership of the railroads of this country, says:

"It follows from this obvious but often forgotten fact that a railway is not economically advantageous to the community unless it pays its way. This conclusion is not in accord with a common opinion. It is often said that a railway or other means of transportation may bring gains to the community, though it be not profitable to its owners. Similarly it is often argued that a government in operating a railway may accept a financial loss, because the people as a whole have gained something that offsets such loss. The contrary view seems the just one. No gain comes from carrying a thing from one place to another unless it can be produced at the first place so much more cheaply that it can afford the cost of carriage to the second. Ability to stand the transportation charge is the test of the utility of the carriage * * *. It would be desirable, obviously, to have all transportation free, and to have every commodity produced once for all where it could be most cheaply produced. But so long as transportation involves labor and waiting a real advantage from exchange is got only if, at a point of consumption, the total cost can be met, including transportation."

Under our traditional policy with respect to our railroads we have invited the investment of private capital. It is claimed by some that under the impulse of public demand, mingled with the speculative element of the American mind, many railroads were constructed that ought not to have been constructed. Some railroads were improvidently built, resulting in excessive cost; many were the victims of inexcusable and vicious financial manipulation, and many are not so located as to yield any warrant for the conclusion that they can in the immediate future earn a return upon the money invested in them.

In this connection it is well to state that many of the so-called weak roads are either branch lines of great systems, separately operated, or are largely owned by the latter. From reports to the Interstate Commerce Commission for the calendar year 1917, it appears that railroad companies are among the largest stockholders of railroads. On 572 class 1 roads and their nonoperating subsidiaries the 20 largest stockholders aggregated 8,301 persons, estates, corporations, or partnerships in number, and their aggregate holdings were 50,873,322 shares, of which railroad corporations owned 48.4 per cent, or nearly one-half.

On December 31, 1916, railroads held securities of other railroads, not including switching and terminal companies, to the amount of $4,716,730,254. It is true that there are many small roads, and some large weak roads, which are not now in a position to meet a large decrease in revenue that may result from a decrease in business due to transition from a war to a peace basis. But they would be in no worse condition than they would have been had there been no taking over by the Government, except only disorganized management, increased cost of labor and materials.

If we enter upon Government ownership now we can not separate the sheep from the goats and purchase only the former. No railroad is so poor that it does not reach some people who have a right to demand a continuation of service. Many poorly located or poorly managed, or mismanaged, railroads have never earned a return on the money invested in them. If they continue to operate, the deficit must be borne by some one. Government ownership is a means of shifting the burden from the owners where it belongs, to the general public where it does not belong. Under wise and effective regulation many of the so-called "weak sisters" in the railroad world may be fed and nurtured so as to restore them to some sort of transportation strength. If the protecting hand of the Government is placed on them they will make little effort to better their situation, but will settle down to a condition where they will be a continual drain upon the Public Treasury. I have never been convinced that Government ownership of a losing railroad proposition will transform it into a gainful one. Remove from all the transportation systems of the country the individual initiative and reduce the management to the dead level of one system of management we will soon find that the country will have only such service as is absolutely necessary, with no incentive in any particular railroad to excel in any direction. In other words, if you take the American idea of "hustle for business" from the railroad world, you reach a dead center of inactivity and inefficiency. I have great faith in the ability of the average American to succeed if he be given opportunity to go ahead. A protecting Government hand in time of war is quite apt to become a restraining Government hand in time of peace.

The hand of the Government should be lifted from the industry of the Nation. The law of supply and demand should be given full play. Business and industry are now marking time. They stand at attention awaiting some action they fear the Government may take, or that is proposed it should take. The war is over, why not enter upon an era of peace so far as our industries are concerned? There is no good reason why the business of the country should remain inactive. Give the business and industrial interests a chance, and they will work out their own salvation. It is not proposed by anyone that the Government should take over the vast business and industrial interests of the country. These interests should be unshackled at once and let them proceed to do business on the terms which experience and good judgment dictate.

For these reasons and many others that might be stated were it necessary, I believe that we should defer consideration of Government ownership, Government guaranties, and Government protection until broader and more effective regulation of privately owned carriers has been given a fair trial.

When it is suggested that the railroads be promptly returned to their owners there is great excitement evident in certain interested circles. It is asserted with confidence and vehemence that to return the railroads to their owners now would be to force many carriers into receiverships, and imperil the financial stability of the Nation itself. It has often been stated that a return of the carriers without some sort of guaranty of future earnings would result in the bankruptcy of at least one-half of them. This dire prediction has been reiterated so continuously and so vehemently that to some extent it has gained lodgement in the public mind. Examination of the facts in respect to this is sufficient to dispel any illusion of the kind.

On December 2, 1918, the President in his address delivered at a joint session of the two Houses of Congress gave notice that the railroads would be returned. In the course of the address he said:

"Every approach to this difficult subject matter of decision brings us face to face, therefore, with this unanswered question: What is it right that we should do with the railroads in the interest of the public and in fairness to their owners?

"Let me say at once that I have no answer ready. The only thing that is perfectly clear to me is that it is not fair either to the public or to the owners of the railroads to leave the question unanswered, and that it will presently become my duty to relinquish control of the roads, even before the expiration of the statutory period, unless there should appear some clear prospect in the meantime of a legislative solution. Their release would at least produce one element of a solution, namely, certainty and a quick stimulation of private initiative."

Later in the same address he said:

"I stand ready and anxious to release the roads from the present control, and I must do so at an early date if by waiting until the statutory limit of time is reached I shall be merely prolonging the period of doubt and uncertainty, which is hurtful to every interest concerned."

The President was right then, and nothing has occurred since to change the situation, except to make more imperative the propriety of the prompt return to the owners of the railroads. In his last message to Congress he has designated January 1, 1920, as the time at which they will be handed back. The claim is now made that unless certain guaranties are provided financial disaster will result from their being turned back, so they must be retained under Federal control for an indefinite period.

More than six months have elapsed since the armistice was signed. To all intents and purposes, with respect to our railroads and business, the war ceased when the armistice was signed last November. No exigency now exists for retention of Federal control of the transportation systems of the country. Under existing peace conditions Federal control is expensive and unnecessary. The expense and inefficiency inheres in the very nature of the system, which, while imperative in time of war, is a misfit in time of peace. The individual control has been removed. The incentive for effort to secure business by good service and superior facilities with respect to the units that go to make up our transportation system as a whole is wanting. The watchfulness as to the success of each carrier is gone. The hand of the individual who directed and controlled the destiny of each separate carrier has been lifted. The effort is to make a success of the whole without necessary attention to the success of the parts. The attempt to initiate all rules, regulations, and practices with respect to the operation of individual roads from Washington by one controlling head could not in the very nature of things result in the most efficient or economical operation. Such an arrangement can not be made responsive to the needs of the commerce of the country in time of peace. A traffic manager or operating official on the ground, in touch with the situation, with first-hand information, is in a far better position to more efficiently and satisfactorily adjust operating problems as they constantly arise. There has not been and there can not really be any denial that the present arrangement is an expensive manner of controlling the transportation systems of the country. The longer it is continued the greater the expense. The longer it is continued the less readily may the railroads be returned to their owners with assurance that they can resume their normal functions with efficiency. There can be no question that physically the sooner the railroads are placed in the hands of their owners the better for them and the better for the country as a whole.

A representative of substantially all the railroads under Federal control has publicly announced that Federal control and operation of the railroads has destroyed their credit, and that to return them to their private owners without at the same time providing for some sort of governmental guaranty of earnings would result in disaster. Let us examine this contention.

When the railroads were taken over by the Government they were more prosperous than they had been in the past. To substantiate this reference may be had to the return made by the railroads themselves to the Interstate Commerce Commission. I submit herewith a table which gives the average rate of dividends declared on dividend-yielding stock of the railroads of the country from June 30, 1892, to June 30, 1916, and for the calendar years 1916 and 1917, the earnings per mile of line, average operating income per mile of railroad, per cent of property investment per mile for the same period, and the corporate surplus accumulations for each year from 1910:

[1] Calendar year.

From this table it appears that considered from the viewpoint of dividend payments, operating income to asserted cost, or surplus accumulations, the railroads were in a more prosperous condition from 1910 to January 1, 1918, than before that period. Under the act passed by the Congress the railroads of the country which were taken over by the Government are guaranteed earnings equal to the average operating income for the fiscal years ended June 30, 1915, 1916, and 1917. Thus there is insured to the railroads during the period of Federal control the largest net return as a three-year average ever received by them. And it is difficult to understand how there is in this situation anything that can form the basis for a claim that railroad credit has been destroyed by reason of Federal operation.

A guaranty of minimum earnings and a limitation of the amount of earnings have all the evils of government ownership with none of the benefits. If we are to guarantee earnings, we might as well enter upon government ownership at once. A guaranty would destroy inspiration and individual initiative. Mr. Howard Elliott, one of the foremost railroad executives in this country, in an address recently delivered said:

"There would seem to be no more reason for a guaranty of a return upon railroads than a return upon banks, coal mines, electric light plants, etc. A guaranty would lead to a divided responsibility and to an increased participation by the Government as the guarantor in the actual management of the properties, which would eventually lead to government ownership. There can be no enduring middle ground; there must be private ownership and operation, with reasonable governmental regulation, or there must be government ownership and operation."

Mr. Samuel Rea, president of the Pennsylvania Co. and other companies forming the Pennsylvania Railroad system, and a man of equal standing in the railroad world with Mr. Elliott, in a recent address before the Chamber of Commerce of the United States with respect to the effect of a government guaranty said:

"A governmental guaranty would plunge the country into a wholesale financial reorganization of the railroads extending over a period of years and would ultimately mean government ownership. But to temporarily palliate the situation the guaranty is to be coupled with private operation. What is to be the capitalization of these private operating corporations? Are they to be mere shells with no large financial stake in the properties they operate and administer? Is there any business man present who would recommend the Government to guarantee returns on property having a value of about $18,000,000,000 and turn it over to 6, or even 18, private operating companies without demanding the power to thereafter define its operating and financial policy? Can any stockholder or bondholder imagine that our Government will guarantee railroad stocks and bonds and charge nothing for that guaranty? Should capital improvement be thereafter made according to the business necessities or on the political judgment of each administration? Would political favoritism as to new improvements, branches and extensions, and orders for supplies be inevitable in the government guarantee plan? Should we then employ officers and men who have political influence? Should we impose this guarantee plan on the country in the midst of the great struggle she must meet to reconstruct her industries and put national affairs and taxation on a peace basis? What period do you think it would take to work out the financial reconstruction of all the railroads of the country, and all their leaseholds, guaranties, and other obligations, and what is to occur meanwhile? * * *

"American industry has made its wonderful progress because the industries and men conducting them have been rewarded for efficiency and penalized for inefficiency. It is the fear of failure as well as the hope of reward or commendation that incites men to do their best. A Government guaranty on private capital invested in transportation would to a large extent remove the fear of failure; but would it be in the public welfare or be helpful to our industries which pay freight rates? If the Government could keep rates at a level that would provide sufficient revenues for all roads to earn their guaranteed income and operating expenses, why can we not equally assume that the Government will allow such adequate rates under a system of Government regulation, stimulated to economy and efficiency by private ownership and initiative and without the blight of a Government guaranty? The guaranty is not a solution of this great economic question, but a patch upon it."

What is needed by the railroads is the return to that individual effort which is a spur to more efficient and adequate service. A guaranty of earnings would be to repeat the experiences of the Government of France. The guaranty system in that country has resulted in a steadily increasing demand on the public treasury. In a recently published statement respecting the guaranty to French railroads, Mr. Frank H. Fayant, assistant to the chairman of the Association of Railway Executives, said:

"But the results of the French guaranty system have been disappointing. There has been no profit sharing. The Western, after 44 years' continuous appeal to the State on account of its guaranty, became so hopelessly involved in the treasury finances that the State in 1908 was compelled to exercise its purchase option. Incidentally it has become a greater burden to the treasury under State operation than it was under private operation. The Midi (Southern) in the half century prior to the war was able in only a dozen years to meet its interest and dividends out of earnings. The Paris-Orleans, which at one time had some hopes of becoming self-supporting, was just before the war making large appeals to the treasury. The Est (Eastern) was self-supporting before the war. The Nord (Northern) and the Paris-Lyon-Mediterranean have always been prosperous and had no need of a guaranty.

"State aid in the pioneer days of railroad building in France was of great assistance in providing the capital needed for these enterprises and in bridging the companies over the early lean years, but in later years the guaranty has only served to entangle the weaker roads in politics and public finance. It has been a handicap to progress and has stunted private initiative. The spirit of the initiative is killed and there is lowering of operating efficiency."

In the course of his statement he also said:

"If we are to retain the advantages of private initiative, and save our transportation system and all our machinery of production from the deadening blight of political meddling, we ought to consider well the dangers involved in any proposal for a financial partnership between the railroads and the Government. While, before the war our system of public control had its obvious faults, under it was developed the most perfect transportation machine in the world. The best railroads of Europe are many years behind ours in engineering development and operating efficiency. With this achievement before us, should we not attempt to correct the recognized faults in our system of regulation, and build on the sure foundation of the past, rather than enter on an era of political experimenting with new and untried policies"?

When the railroads are returned, Congress by appropriation of the necessary moneys should provide for payment to them the agreed sums to which they are entitled, return to them the moneys taken from them by the Government, and restore them to their owners in the same condition as when taken over. When this is done, the railroads as a whole would resume their normal functions on a most prosperous basis.

But it is said that the wages of employees of railroads have been raised to such an extent as to absorb the increased rates initiated by the Director General, and that unless there is some guarantee of increased rates on their return they will not be able to earn the same net income as they were earning when taken over. The figures submitted to the commission do not show that the carriers are suffering from lack of gross income. In January, 1919, the gross receipts of class 1 railroads exceeded by $111,427,193 the receipts of the same month in 1918. In February, 1919, they exceeded by $61,924,937 those of February, 1918. It does appear that there has been a decline in operating income. This decline is no doubt due in part to increased operating expenses. How much of the increase is due to the fact that there has been a revolution of management and operation can not be determined with accuracy. That this change has an important bearing on the matter there can be no doubt. The removal of individual supervision and direction from the operation of the railroads of the country has resulted in large increases in operating expenses. The expression of a fear that more effective regulation will deprive the railroads of the country of a just return for service rendered is but a reassertion of the old fear that was given voice before the taking over. The people of this country have ever been and they are now ready and willing to pay to the railroads such rates of freight, passenger fares, and other charges for service rendered as shall be just and reasonable. There is no good reason for not believing that just and reasonable rates will be provided for the future. If wages and cost of materials are such as to demand higher freight rates and other charges in order that the railroads shall render adequate and efficient transportation service, the regulating body on being shown the facts can be depended upon to deal justly with the situation.

The business of our country is not to stand still. I have faith enough in the American producer to believe that our national commerce will continue to expand as it has in the past. The commerce of the country can not expand to any marked extent without entailing benefit on our transportation system. They will grow with the growth of industry. Transportation and industry are indissolubly linked together. That time is not at hand, nor is there any prospect that it will ever come, that the public will be so blind as not to see that so great an industry as the railroads can be crippled without at the same time crippling the others.

As before stated, while under Federal control the income of the railroad companies is based on the operating income they received for the three fiscal years of 1915, 1916, and 1917. They are insured that income no matter what has been or what may be the conditions of traffic. Under the law their properties are to be returned to them in as good physical conditions as when they passed to Federal control.

The net income the railroads now receive is based on the highest average earnings they have ever received in any three-year period. The average yearly return on which payment is now made is approximately $936,000,000. A comparison with the returns for the years 1912, 1913, and 1914 is interesting. The following table compiled from sworn reports of the railroads to the commission gives the operating revenues, income from operation, and average income per mile of line for those years:

	Operating revenues.	Income from operation.	Average income per mile of line.
1912	$2,906,415,869	$751,266,806	$3,044
1913	3,193,117,834	829,863,248	3,420
1914	3,111,396,422	704,685,079	2,869

The average income for the three years was $761,938,378. For the year 1915 the operating revenue was $2,956,193,202; income from operation, $727,546,101; and average income per mile of line, $2,840.

The following table gives the operating revenues, income from operation, and average income per mile of line for the calendar years 1916, 1917, and 1918:

	Operating revenues.	Income from operation.	Average income per mile of line.
1916	$3,691,065,217	$1,100,545,422	$4,277
1917	4,115,413,056	986,819,181	3,811
1918	4,995,362,625	732,064,301	2,780

It will be observed that the average income for the latter three years is $939,809,635, about $3,000,000 more than the guaranteed income. The income from operation in the calendar year 1918 was $29,874,077, or 3.9 per cent less than the average for the three years, 1912, 1913, and 1914; $21,967,175, or 2.9 per cent less than the average of 1913, 1914, and 1915; and $15,948,711, or 2.2 per cent more than the average for 1914 and 1915, while the average income for the calendar years 1916, 1917, and 1918 exceeds that for the fiscal years 1912, 1913, and 1914 by $177,875,257, or 23.4 per cent.

It is true there has been an increase in capital issues and property investment since 1912. From reports of the railroads to the commission the average percentage of operating income to the average outstanding capital for the three fiscal years, 1912, 1913, and 1914, was 3.98 and to property investment 4.59. The average percentage of operating income to the average outstanding capital for the calendar years 1916, 1917, and 1918 was 4.75, and to property investment 5.08. This shows that the percentage of operating income to capital increased 0.77 per cent and to property investment 0.49 per cent.

From the returns already received, which include only a few of the roads of the country, it appears that the credit balances will be as large on January 1, 1919, as on January 1, 1918. During the year 1918 dividends were paid in substantially the same amount as during the previous year, while the roads were under private management. The guaranteed operating income for 1919 will be the same as received in 1918. Add to this the corporate income for the year and the credit balance of the railroads as a whole will be substantially the same on January 1, 1920, as on January 1, 1918.

It is now asserted that the carriers of the country during January, February, and March of this year did not earn the Government guaranty by some $200,000,000. This assertion is on the assumption of an equal monthly accural of the annual compensation which the Government must pay the roads. The early months of any year, however, are not equal in earning power to the average per month for the year.

The fallacy of estimating the operating income of any one year by the operating income of the first three months, January, February, and March, is graphically illustrated in the following table, which refers to reports of class 1 roads only:

	Railway operating income for first 3 months.	Railway operating income for 12 months based on the first 3 months.	Actual railway operating income for 12 months.
1912, fiscal	$137,779,550	$551,118,200	$736,466,326
1913, fiscal	152,023,732	608,094,928	816,510,793
1914, fiscal	89,822,685	359,290,740	692,330,572
1915, fiscal	133,783,495	535,133,980	716,476,186
1916, calendar	213,957,378	855,829,512	1,081,556,496
1917, calendar	189,282,143	757,128,572	970,197,438
1918, calendar	81,343,850	325,375,460	719,159,540

If a comparison is made between the railway operating income of January, February, and March, 1919, and the corresponding months of the test period, 1915, 1916, and 1917, it will be found that the income for the first quarter of 1919 was one hundred and thirty-one millions less than for the corresponding part of the test period, and for the first quarter of 1918 ninety-eight millions less, or one hundred and fourteen millions as the average of the first quarter of the years 1918 and 1919, and not about $200,000,000, as asserted.

In his statement in a communication addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury made public May 25, the Director General, in explaining the deficits for the years 1918 and 1919 in operating revenue under that of the guaranteed return for the first quarter of the years 1918 and 1919, in part, says:

"The operating deficit for the year 1918 was due largely to two facts: First, the winter of 1918 was unprecedented in its severity and in its costly effect on railroad operations; and, second, the increases in passenger and freight rates, averaging about 25 per cent, were in effect for only a few days in excess of 6 months, while heavily increased expenses due to war conditions were effective on an ascending scale throughout the 12 months.

"The operating deficit for the first four months of 1919 is due in part to the cumulative high levels of cost, brought about by the war, for labor and materials and in part to the sudden and abnormal falling off of business as a result of the cessation of war activities, the sudden drop in the demand for fuel and for other basic commodities, and the general state of hesitancy due to the transition from war conditions to peace conditions. The fact that the present period is transitional and apparently on the eve of important changes has made it expedient to defer, until the matter can be more accurately measured, the consideration of the question, now frequently raised, of an increase in rates."

In giving the figures and making the comparisons I must not be understood as taking the position that the railroads of the country have earned as much or more than they should have earned or were entitled to earn. My sole effort has been to give the facts as I find them to be, in order that the situation may be looked squarely in the face and to ascertain whether there is a foundation for the statement that our railroads will be confronted with bankruptcy should they be restored to their owners.

What is there in the situation that the carriers will occupy on January 1, 1920, that warrants the claim that their being turned back would mean bankruptcy to them? It is said that the outlook is bad, and that the railroads can not now stand alone. The claim is made that business is at low ebb; that wages and expenses are at high tide; and that to meet that condition there must be a radical reorganization of our transportation systems that shall involve some sort of a guaranty upon the part of the Government that net incomes of all carriers shall never be less than a return on property investment that shall be as great as or greater than the average return for the years 1915, 1916, and 1917, without regard to the location of particular lines or their previous financial history.

In the Railway Age of May 9, 1919, the following discussion of traffic conditions appears:

"It is true there has been a decline of traffic, and some refer to the business which has been handled thus far this year as abnormally small. It is smaller than that of 1918 or 1917; but conditions in 1917 and 1918 were not normal, and the traffic handled in those years showed a vast increase, largely due to war conditions. Let us go back to the first three months of 1916. In that year the railways had the largest increase of traffic that ever occurred in any single year. They made the largest operating income ever made in one year. Everyone remembers this. Doubtless, consequently, most people assume that because of the recent decline in traffic the business which has been moved thus far this year has been much less than in the remarkable year 1916. It is somewhat disconcerting, therefore, to find that in the first three months of 1919 the freight traffic of the railways was 85,000,000,000 ton-miles, while in the first three months of 1916 it was only 80,000,000,000 ton-miles, an increase in 1919 over 1916 of over 6 per cent. Furthermore, the traffic handled in the first three months of this year was only 10 per cent less than that moved in the corresponding three months of 1917 and 1918. The railways moved less freight in February and March of this year than in the same months of 1917 and 1918, but they moved more in January than in either of those years."

In its issue of May 30 the Railway Age says:

"A mistake in compiling statistics caused the Railway Age to make a misleading comparison in the editorial in its issue of May 9, entitled "The Railroads—a Bankrupt Industry," between the traffic handled in the first three months of 1916 and the first three months of 1919. It was stated in the editorial in question that in the first three months of 1919 the freight traffic of the railways was 85,000,000,000 ton-miles, while in the first three months of 1916 it was only 80,000,000,000 ton-miles, an increase in 1919 over 1916 of over 6 per cent. A recheck of the statistics shows that the total mileage in the first three months of 1916 was almost 90,000,000,000. With this correction the statistics show that the ton-mileage in the first three months of 1919 was 5 per cent less than the first three months of 1916, while the total earnings of the railways were 38 per cent greater and the operating expenses 85 per cent greater."

There always have been and there will be periods of business depression. No law that can be conceived or enacted and no tribunal that may be appointed can control the yield of crops or the production and sale of the industries of the country. Rates of freight or other charges for transportation can not be so made that they will rise and fall in response to the volume of production from season to season. If the carriers of the country may not be safely returned on January 1, 1920, when in receipt of the guaranty for the preceding two years, it may be asserted with confidence that they never will be in condition to be so returned.

It is a fact that operating expenses have increased during Federal control, due to wage increases, increased cost of materials and supplies, and to unavoidably expensive operation and changed operating and financial management during the war. Unless it is to be assumed that war conditions are to continue indefinitely in times of peace, there is bound to be a decrease in operating costs. As pointed out by the Director General in a recent statement, the organization of the carriers is now equipped to handle a much larger business than is offered for transportation. If the railroads are returned, there is little doubt that decreases in operating costs can be effected.

On every hand there are prophecies of business activity and prosperity. Reports from our Agricultural Department are to the effect that bountiful crops are in prospect. Under such circumstances, the owners of the railroads of the country should welcome a return to efficient and economical management of their properties, and they should do this with confidence that in the coming prosperity they will receive abundant share.

It is asserted by the Secretary of the Treasury that the last public loan has been made. In the future the Government is not to be in the market as a borrower from the public. If this be so, apparently there is no good reason for apprehension that after January 1 next the railroads may not secure from the public moneys to refund maturing obligations or to provide for improvements and betterments at reasonable interest rates. In addition to this it is proposed that issues of securities, etc., by railroads shall be placed under Federal control. If a railroad desires to borrow money for any purpose this Federal authority should have power to examine into the outstanding obligations of such railroad, and when it determines and finds that the purpose of acquiring the money is one necessary to promote the transportation interests of the country, and the railroad is in a position to earn sufficient to pay interest on the obligation, the question of securing the money at a reasonable rate of interest from the investing public should be assured.

It is often said in connection with the return of the roads that it is necessary that State commissions should be deprived of all rate-making power, and that all the making and determination as to the reasonableness of railroad rates, fares, and charges should be lodged with some Federal authority. Quite aside from any constitutional question I do not believe that the proposal in this respect should be adopted. In the first place the conflict between State-made rates and rates made by Federal authority is more apparent than real. I have seen it stated that only about 15 per cent of the commerce of the country moves wholly intrastate, while about 23 per cent of the total revenue is derived therefrom. If this is so then at least 85 per cent of the traffic of the country is now under direct Federal control and the remainder under indirect control where it casts an undue burden on the other. I am not one who believes that the 15 per cent controls the 85 per cent to any such extent as to be disastrous to the railroads of the country. In times past there has been evidence that State commissions unduly favored shippers of their own States as a matter of retaliation against acts of commissions in adjoining States. The State commissioners themselves now willingly concede that retaliatory action of the kind is neither just nor proper. There does not now apparently exist any of that spirit in the State commissions. Free and full cooperation between State commissions and the Interstate Commerce Commission will bring about that uniformity of rates, charges, and regulations between States and interstate traffic which should lead to prosperity of carriers and the public alike. A certain amount of traffic begins and ends in a State. The movement of such traffic has no relation to interstate traffic. The making of rates on such traffic should be by State authority. To place such traffic under control of a Federal body beyond the power now vested to prevent unjust discrimination against or undue burden upon interstate commerce would be a reversal of our dual form of government, which no one proposes to change.

It has also been proposed that the Congress should provide for the consolidation or merger of all railroads in a given territory under a Federal charter, all such merged roads to be operated as one. This is only a difference in degree from the national consolidation which now exists as a war necessity. We should go slow in the way of permitting or requiring the consolidation of the railroads of the country. The inevitable tendency in such consolidations is to level down the best in order to level up the poorest. The country had some experience with consolidation in the New York, New Haven & Hartford attempt to consolidate and control all the transportation systems of New England. When the scheme originated the New York, New Haven & Hartford was regarded as one of the best managed and operated railroad systems in the country. Its stocks and bonds were recognized as securities of the highest standard. A citizen who died and was able to leave his family a substantial block of New Haven securities did so with confidence that they were amply protected. Some one devised the consolidation. It was inevitable that one of two things was bound to happen—either that the New Haven bring its consolidated interests up to its high level or that it go down to the lower level of the others. The latter happened, and we see the New Haven's present difficulties. It were well enough, perhaps, to give authority to a regulating body to permit or require consolidation of railroads in the interest of the public, but the exercise of the power should be sparingly used, and then only in a clear case that public benefit would result. A consolidation of a number of carriers in any region of this country will doubtless increase the cost of transportation to the public and at the same time reduce the service nearer to a level of bare necessity. There is good in railroad competition. It results in better railroads, better equipment, and more adequate facilities and service. The good that comes from competition should be preserved, with power in the regulating authority to discourage or prevent wasteful competition which sometimes exists with respect to transportation of freight and passengers between rail and water carriers. We occasionally hear a reference to cutthroat competition between carriers. With respect to this, it is safe to say that as regards rates no such competition now exists, nor has any such existed in this country for many years past.

Among the things that should be provided in a regulatory statute should be control of securities of carriers, provisions for more adequate control of facilities and equipment, and terminals should be opened at junction points for service to carriers reaching those points to meet the requirements of the public upon terms that shall be just as between the carriers. It is true that in most large cities of the country one or more railroads dominate the terminals and refuse access to them or charge exorbitantly for the privilege.

There has been much talk among some interests with regard to the provisions of the fourth section of the act. Bills have been introduced in Congress to provide that no carrier shall charge less for a long haul than for a shorter haul included in the longer. If the Federal regulatory body be given power to prescribe minimum as well as maximum rates, it would be in a position to more adequately control the situation respecting rates for long and short hauls. In this connection it is to be observed that rates by water and by rail in this country are so closely related that adequate and effective regulation is not practicable unless water and rail transportation are placed in control of the same authority. If that is done, means are thereby provided for the necessary encouragement and protection of transportation by water. With power to prescribe minimum rates the regulating authority can effectively prevent the stifling of water transportation by way of inordinately low rates by rail.

It has been suggested that the Congress should provide for regional commissioners or deputy commissioners, who should reside in certain sections of the country and there hear and dispose of the cases arising in the region, with appeal to the full commission in Washington. There are many reasons why such an arrangement would be unwise. In the first place, the location of the regional commissions about the country would be very expensive. To be effective such commissions should be supplied with complete tariff files and a corps of experienced tariff and other experts. The expense necessary would not result in compensating benefit.

Local representatives would soon reflect in their findings and decisions the influence of local or special interests. The commission as it now is constituted is composed of commissioners selected from various parts of the country. In reaching its conclusions the commission renders its findings from the viewpoint solely of the interests of the whole country. Railroad rates and rate adjustments are so made that there is a relationship between different sections of the country. The decisions by one regional commission will lead to confusion and embarrassment as between the different regions, from which we are now free.

Full and free cooperation with State commissions and power given the Federal body to use the personnel, records, and facilities of State commissions should insure greater uniformity and bring into review the local necessities and conditions.

Decisions by regional commissions from which appeal may be taken to the full commission would delay final adjudication. What is needed in rate controversies is prompt decision. Manifestly, this prompt disposal of such controversies is in the public interest. Under the act of Congress providing for a division of the commission into bodies of three for the disposition of cases, opportunity is afforded for the prompt disposal of them; but the commission did not get the new plan in complete working order before war was declared and the railroads taken over by the Government. Action by a commission on rules, charges, and regulations must be as nearly uniform as possible, and regional commissions can not in the nature of things lead to uniformity.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, no one can doubt that the effect of adopting the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] will be to increase the deficit that everyone now concedes already exists in railway revenues under Federal operation. I express the opinion that in important matters the Federal administration of railroads has been successful, and when the subject has been analyzed with a view to a fair conclusion criticisms which are being heaped upon the Federal administration of railroads will be found in many particulars to be unfair and unjust; but whether that be true or not, it is a fact that under existing rates the revenues are inadequate to meet the expenses of the Government in the operation of the railroads. The shortage this year, as has been stated by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], will not be less than $500,000,000, and it may be $800,000,000. If you add to that an additional shortage of $200,000,000 occasioned by an automatic and ill-considered reduction in intrastate rates, you will have a shortage of something like eight hundred million or one billion dollars, and you will make imperative a great and an immediate increase in the rates that are now being levied on interstate commerce.

That is not the only effect. If you adopt this amendment and cut off $200,000,000 of revenue from the railroads arising from intrastate commerce you will further depress and impair the value of railroad securities. I do not assert that the market value of railroad securities depends solely on the revenues arising from the rates levied on commerce, but I do know that if you establish a policy to levy rates which are admittedly inadequate to meet the expenses of operating the railroads you will inevitably decrease the value of securities, and, in addition to that, you will make it difficult, if not impossible, to secure additional investments in railroad properties and securities. This is related to the biggest question before Congress affecting the commerce of the country. If you cut off this revenue, which is fair, on the whole, you will depress railroad securities and involve the Government in a larger burden of debt and at the same time make doubtful, if not impossible, necessary improvements in railroad properties.

Mr. POMERENE. And, Mr. President, it would also compel an increase in the rates in interstate commerce.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; I have stated that a time or two, but I thank the Senator for suggesting it in this connection. The burden on interstate commerce would, of course, be correspondingly increased.

It is said that $1,000,000,000 should be invested in the improvement of railroads within the next year. I do not know whether or not that estimate is accurate, or even approximately so, but I do know, in order to meet the requirements of the expanding commerce of this country, some large fund must be invested.

We are committing ourselves to the policy of private control and operation of railroads. I think I need not argue the fact that in this country sentiment in favor of public operation and control—public ownership—is diminishing, and there is no probability of reaction in the early future, however much some Senators may desire it. Then, if it is necessary and imperative that, in the interests of the commerce of the country, large additional sums be invested in railroad improvements and securities in the coming year, why should we make that action impossible by enacting the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee?

The only effect that the adoption of this amendment would have, in my opinion, would be to encompass the defeat of any legislation on the subject of rate regulation at this time. I do not believe that any member of the Interstate Commerce Committee who has studied the question—and some of us have been studying it for years—I do not believe that any Senator who has studied the question diligently would expect anything else to result from the adoption of the amendment than the recommittal of this bill to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR].

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I ask, out of order, to file a report from a committee.

Mr. ROBINSON. I object.

Mr. KNOX. I do not ask for any action on it; I merely want it to go to the calendar.

Mr. ROBINSON. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR].

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am not going to argue this question at all, but I share the opinion of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], that it would be most unfortunate if this amendment were to be adopted. We want to get back to normal times just as quickly as we can; but we can not do everything in a minute. If we are going to keep these interstate rates up as they now are—and they will be there for some time—and confer upon the State commissions the right within a short time to reduce the intrastate rates below the needs of the transportation companies, we are going to that very extent to cripple the entire transportation system of the country. I trust the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I merely want to say that on further investigation I find that the McKellar amendment has a different object from mine. The object of my amendment was to put the State commissions on the same basis as this bill puts the Interstate Commerce Commission. It had no purpose of restoring at this time the intrastate rates as they existed before the war.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR].

The amendment was rejected.

NATIONAL PEACE POLICY.

Mr. KNOX and Mr. TRAMMELL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KNOX. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] having withdrawn his objection to my request to file a report from the Committee on Foreign Relations, I now renew the request.

Mr. SWANSON. It is understood that after this is done a motion will be made to adjourn over until Monday?

Mr. KNOX. I so understand.

Mr. ROBINSON. With that information, I take pleasure in withdrawing any objection I have made to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KNOX. From the Committee on Foreign Relations I report back favorably, with an amendment, the resolution (S. Res. 76) defining a peace treaty which shall assure to the people of the United States the attainment of the ends for which they entered the war, and declaring the policy of our Government to meet fully obligations to ourselves and to the world, and I submit a report (No. 15) thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be placed on the calendar.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. LODGE. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 641) to amend section 10 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I have an amendment which I desire to offer to the pending bill, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 16, after the word "systems," it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That no intrastate rate shall be increased until at least 30 days' notice of the proposed increase has been given to the shippers of the State in which the increase is proposed, and a hearing granted.

Mr. CUMMINS. In so far as I have authority to do so, or can do so, I accept the amendment.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I move the adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING obtained the floor.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. TRAMMELL. On yesterday an amendment was offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], and it was adopted, providing that recovery should not be had against the Railroad Administration on claims which accrued prior to Government control. The amendment was offered and passed rather hurriedly and without very much consideration. After some reflection I am impressed that it is a bad amendment, and, therefore, I wish to make a motion that the vote by which it was adopted be reconsidered if that is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators have heard the motion——

Mr. POMERENE. My attention was attracted to another matter. I do not understand the import of the Senator's suggestion.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I will explain it briefly. The substance of the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana is that if a judgment is rendered against the Railroad Administration, recovery can not be had against the proceeds of the property in the hands of the Government, unless it is upon a claim which accrued after Government control; in other words, if the judgment is based upon a claim which accrued prior to Government control, no recovery can be had; therefore staying the remedy and the rights of the claimant upon his judgment for a claim that accrued prior to Government control. I think it would work a great injustice to those who have claims against the railroads and would practically suspend the operation of their judgments. That is the reason I make the motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, while I do not think the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] is necessary, yet I think that the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] has not stated it, as I recall it, with entire accuracy. There is a provision in the bill that final judgments shall be promptly paid by the Director General either from the revenues of the properties or from the revolving fund. The Senator from Indiana moved that that requirement be limited to judgments recovered upon causes of action arising after Federal control. It does not, however, in any way impair the remedy of the plaintiff in connection with judgments rendered upon causes of action arising before Federal control, except that they can not levy their judgments upon the property of the carrier so long as it is in Federal possession, and the collection of such judgments, unless they can find property which is not within the control of the Government, is postponed until some further adjustment is made. I think it is quite clear that the Federal Government ought not to be required to pay all of the judgments that were rendered against the railroad companies before the Government took possession either out of the revolving fund or out of the current revenues. It is one of those difficult and vexatious questions that will have to be adjusted, in my opinion, at a later time.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Take a judgment of the character that we are now discussing—that is, a judgment against a railroad that is under Government control—is it not within the purview of the authority of the administration to pay that judgment and charge it up against the compensation that the railroad is entitled to receive?

Mr. CUMMINS. Unfortunately it is not at the present time. I assume that Congress could possibly give the Government that authority; but I think it is perfectly clear that when the Government takes over these properties in order to operate them for a public purpose it can not allow interference with that operation by levying process for the collection of a debt upon the property being operated. I am sure the Senator from Florida will agree with me about that.

The next inquiry is, Whether it would be wise to require the Government to take from the revenues which it is receiving in the operation of the property sufficient to pay the judgments which had been recovered before the Government took possession or upon causes of action which arose before the Government took possession? It is a very difficult matter to adjust, but it is hard to be entirely equitable in the transition that was made originally from private to public operation and which we must shortly make when we return to private operation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. Would it not be manifestly equitable, fair, and just to insert a provision in this bill that where final judgments have been rendered against the railroads the Director General is authorized to pay them out of the rents and profits that are guaranteed to the railroad corporations? I think that by all means ought to be done.

Mr. CUMMINS. I would be entirely willing to see an amendment of that kind made——

Mr. McKELLAR. I will offer an amendment of that kind.

Mr. CUMMINS. But that is not the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana, which the Senator from Florida now seeks to reconsider.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is perfectly manifest that these litigants who have heretofore obtained judgments ought not to be postponed or deprived of their recoveries against the railroads.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from Tennessee is right about that.

Mr. McKELLAR. And I will offer an amendment on that subject, if the Senator from Iowa will pardon me a moment.

Mr. CUMMINS. An amendment that simply authorizes the Director General to take from the compensation that is due to these companies from time to time sufficient to pay judgments which have been rendered against the companies would be entirely agreeable to me.

Mr. McKELLAR. Final judgments that have been rendered.

Mr. WATSON. Yes; and I shall not object to that amendment, though, after all, I think it makes but a slight difference in the long run.

Mr. McKELLAR. The difference about it is that a number of judgments have been in suspense for quite a while, and when the Railroad Administration took charge of the railroads it was held by it that it had no authority to pay these judgments; and I know a great many of them have been held up—judgments that ought to have been paid and are simply being postponed. I will prepare an amendment along that line.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think that the claim of a judgment creditor is superior to the interest of either the stockholder or the bondholder, and I think such judgments ought to be paid.

Mr. WATSON. I shall not object at all to the amendment that is to be proposed by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will have it ready in just a moment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, are these judgments which are to be paid, under the view suggested by the Senator from Tennessee, to be deducted from the amount guaranteed by the Government to the railroad companies, or out of any sum that might go to the railroad companies above the guaranteed amount to be paid?

Mr. CUMMINS. There is not anything that goes to the railroad companies above the guaranteed amount.

Mr. KING. I understand that there is not, except perhaps in some instances where the railroads have had a very large earning capacity. I conceived that it was possible that some companies might receive more than the guaranteed amount.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the Senator from Utah, I think, does not remember the law of March 17, 1918, correctly. The Government pays to these railways a certain sum, ascertained in the manner provided by law, as compensation for the use of the property. If the property earns more than the sum which the Government has agreed to pay, the excess belongs to the Government of the United States and not to the railway companies.

Mr. KING. I find, then, that I am in error. I supposed that a portion of that excess went to the stockholders of the corporation.

Mr. CUMMINS. No portion whatever.

Mr. KING. May I ask, in this connection, whether the Government has received any amount from any of the railroads above the guaranty?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not able to answer that question with absolute certainty, but I do not know of any such railroad. It may be that there are one or two which have earned more than the compensation which the Government agreed to pay; but if there are they have not come to my notice.

Mr. KING. Of course, there were a number of railroads which, before the Government took control of them, earned an amount in excess of that which they are now receiving.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think there is a single railroad that earned more. I do not mean that they did not earn a little more in 1917 or 1916 or 1915 than the Government agreed to pay; but there is no railroad, so far as I know, which has earned in excess of the average net income for the three years before the war, and that is the basis of the contracts for compensation.

Mr. KING. I did not have the three-year period in mind; but my recollection of the figures is that a number of the railroads did receive an amount in excess of that paid by the Government at some period, not very remote, before the Government took over the railroads.

Mr. CUMMINS. No. The Senator from Utah will remember that the Government deals with each road separately.

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. And it agrees to pay that road the average net income for the three years preceding the war. Now, so far as I know, there is no road whose average net income for 1918, and up to this time in 1919, equals the average net income of that road for the three years prior to the war.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I believe the question now is the motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is the motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana was adopted yesterday, which is, on page 2, in line 10, after the word "judgments," to insert the words "on causes of action arising during Federal control."

The question now is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Florida to reconsider that amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I very much hope that will not be done.

Mr. WATSON. I trust that will not prevail. I think the Senator from Tennessee has prepared an amendment that will meet the objection of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. TRAMMEL. Mr. President, of course I do not know just what the Senator's amendment is going to provide. I can not quite comprehend, however, how it will meet the objection, as this amendment specifically provides that judgments shall not be paid upon claims accruing prior to Government control. Of course, he might write an amendment which would be directly in conflict with it, and the two would have to be construed together. What I had in contemplation when I made the motion was that if we reconsider this amendment I will then offer as a substitute for this amendment an amendment on page 2, in line 14, which will provide as follows:

> And upon claims accruing prior to Government control it shall become a charge against the defendant company.

In other words, the Railroad Administration will go ahead and settle the claim, but it shall be a charge then against the defendant company, or the corporation involved in the judgment. Of course, I had in mind, doubtless, just what the Senator from Tennessee is covering with his amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment in line 10, page 2, was adopted. [Putting the question.] By the sound, the noes seem to have it.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I call for the yeas and nays; and, pending that, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Beckham	Harris	Myers	Smith, Ariz.
Capper	Harrison	Nelson	Smoot
Chamberlain	Jones, N. Mex.	New	Spencer
Cummins	Jones, Wash.	Newberry	Stanley
Curtis	Kellogg	Nugent	Sterling
Dial	Kendrick	Overman	Sutherland
Edge	King	Phelan	Trammell
Elkins	Kirby	Phipps	Walsh, Mass.
Fall	La Follette	Poindexter	Walsh, Mont.
Fletcher	Lenroot	Pomerene	Warren
France	McCumber	Ransdell	Watson
Frelinghuysen	McKellar	Reed	Williams
Gronna	McNary	Sheppard
Hale	Moses	Sherman

Mr. HARRIS. My colleague, the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], is necessarily detained from the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-eight Senators having responded to the roll call, there is a quorum present. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] was agreed to on yesterday.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I ask to have the question stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the pending question.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Florida moves to reconsider the vote by which the Senate on yesterday adopted the following amendment, offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON]:

On page 2, after the word "judgments," in line 10, the following amendment was inserted:

On causes of action arising during Federal control.

So that, as amended, it reads:

All final judgments on causes of action arising during Federal control for a plaintiff or plaintiffs rendered in actions for personal injuries or for loss of or damage to property shall be promptly paid by the Director General of Railroads, either from the operating revenue of the defendant or defendants or the revolving fund herein created.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Upon that the Senator from Florida demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I find that the object sought by me may be reached by an amendment without a reconsideration of the amendment just stated. Therefore I withdraw the motion for the reconsideration of that vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to reconsider is withdrawn.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I move that the bill be amended, on page 2, line 14, by inserting after the word "created," the words "and final judgments based on claims accruing prior to Government control shall be paid by the Director General of Railroads and charged against the compensation account of the particular railroad involved." I move the adoption of that amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, with the spirit of the amendment just offered by the Senator from Florida I have no quarrel. I think it is entirely proper that these railroads shall pay out of their compensation the judgments which have been rendered against them before Federal control, or judgments upon causes of action arising before Federal control; and therefore I accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 14, after the word "created," it is proposed to insert a comma and the following words:

And final judgments based on claims accruing prior to Government control shall be paid by the Director General of Railroads and charged against the compensation account of the particular railroad involved.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Florida if he will not accept an amendment to his amendment, to insert after the word "Railroads" the words "out of such compensation as is or has been agreed to be paid to such railroad company."

Mr. TRAMMELL. That will be accepted.

Mr. McKELLAR. In other words, it will be taken out of the railroad's funds.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the two amendments mean the same thing.

Mr. McKELLAR. Precisely the same.

Mr. TRAMMELL. They seem to me to mean the same thing. It is just a question of the selection of verbiage and phraseology.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment of the Senator from Florida will be so modified. The Secretary will state the amendment as modified.

The SECRETARY. As modified, the amendment now reads:

On page 2, line 14, after the word "created," insert a comma and the following: "and final judgments based on claims accruing prior to Government control shall be paid by the Director General of Railroads out of such compensation as is or has been agreed to be paid to such railroad company."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I was called from the Chamber a few moments ago. I had been here pretty steadily during the day and on returning to the Chamber I understand a motion has been made that when the Senate adjourns this afternoon it shall adjourn until Monday next.

I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry and then I shall ask to be heard upon it. Is a motion to reconsider in order made by one who confessedly did not vote on the question? I was out of the Chamber, and I did not vote.

I can not understand, Mr. President, why it is that the Senate should adjourn from this afternoon until Monday when there is business here to be transacted. I had up a few days ago a very important measure providing vocational training for men injured in industries. We had an hour and a half or two hours' consideration of that measure. It was then set aside because of the unfinished business, the resolution of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. This other important measure that has come up now will be finished, I suppose, this afternoon. I had assumed that the Senate would go ahead with the other bill at the conclusion of the bill which is now the unfinished business, and I had intended to make a motion to that effect. That bill could have been passed certainly by Saturday night, or defeated, if it is to be defeated, but I do not like to have it submarined in this manner.

Mr. GRONNA. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENYON. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. I am very glad the Senator from Iowa has called the attention of the Senate to the agreement to adjourn over. I will say for the information of the Senate that I had hoped to be able to report the Agricultural appropriation bill to the Senate on Saturday. Certainly we ought to dispose of the supply bills as quickly as possible. I can see no reason why we should adjourn for three days at a time when the appropriation bills are now being considered in committees, and, of course, will shortly be reported.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will my colleague and the Senator from North Dakota be willing to postpone the discussion of this subject until the pending bill has been passed?

Mr. KENYON. When does my colleague think it will be passed?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think it can be passed in less than three minutes.

Mr. KENYON. I have been waiting all day for its final passage. If some one then does not immediately move to adjourn, which is not a debatable motion——

Mr. McKELLAR. Why not let the pending bill be passed and then take up the bill the Senator from Iowa has in charge? It is a measure in which I am very greatly interested, and I do not see why we can not pass it this afternoon.

Mr. KENYON. May I ask whether a Senator who is not present can make a motion to reconsider?

Mr. WATSON. Why not let the discussion of that question go over until the pending bill has been passed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa withdraw his request?

Mr. KENYON. I withdraw the request for three minutes, until the pending bill can be passed.

Mr. WATSON. Then the junior Senator from Iowa can move to take up his bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no further amendment, it will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION.

Mr. KENYON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 18) to provide for the promotion of vocational rehabilitation of persons disabled in industry or otherwise and their return to civil employment.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has heretofore been read and certain committee amendments have been agreed to.

Mr. KENYON. There are some Senators who are opposed to this bill. I do not see them in the Chamber and I think in fairness I should suggest the absence of a quorum. I make that suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Henderson	McCumber	Smith, Ariz.
Beckham	Hitchcock	McNary	Smoot
Capper	Johnson, Calif.	Moses	Thomas
Cummins	Jones, N. Mex.	New	Trammell
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Underwood
Dial	Kendrick	Nugent	Walsh, Mass.
Dillingham	Kenyon	Overman	Walsh, Mont.
Elkins	King	Page	Watson
Fletcher	Knox	Poindexter	Williams
France	La Follette	Pomerene
Hale	Lenroot	Ransdell
Harrison	Lodge	Sheppard

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOSES in the chair). Forty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. PHELAN, and Mr. SUTHERLAND answered to their names when called.

Mr. NEWBERRY, Mr. EDGE, Mr. HARRIS, Mr. PHIPPS, Mr. STANLEY, and Mr. WARREN entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Secretary will state the first amendment of the Committee on Education and Labor which has not been acted upon.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] is very solicitous that this measure should go over until Monday. He is very persuasive about it. I think it is a mistake myself. There is no reason why the Senate should not stay here and do business to-morrow and the next day. But inasmuch as the Senator has so urgently requested it, I am not going to insist on going on with the bill this afternoon. I understand that it is now the unfinished business. Would the Senator object to a few minor amendments which have been proposed, or would he prefer to have it all go over until Monday?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator from Iowa that there are committee amendments not yet acted upon.

Mr. KENYON. I know all the committee amendments have not been agreed to.

Mr. KING. On several of the committee amendments I want to make some observations, but if they are verbal changes or minor amendments I have no objection.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator would prefer that the amendments should go over until Monday?

Mr. KING. I would prefer that course.

Mr. KENYON. Inasmuch as the Senate has already agreed to adjourn until Monday—and I presume that motion will stand, as this bill is the unfinished business—I give notice that I am going to insist on a fair consideration of the measure until we reach a conclusion upon it one way or the other.

Mr. KING. I shall join with the Senator in any request he may make in respect to that matter.

Mr. KENYON. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

DEFICIENCY IN RAILROAD OPERATION.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5312) to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for carrying out the act entitled, "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for carrying out the act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918, there is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated $750,000,000, which shall be in addition to the appropriation of $500,000,000 made in section 6 of said act, and shall be subject in all respects to the same authority for, and restriction of, expenditure as the said $500,000,000.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, this is——

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield? Does the Senator know whether the Committee on Interstate Commerce have given any consideration to this measure and whether it meets with their approval?

Mr. WARREN. I addressed that interrogatory to the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce. I did so as late as yesterday. He had nothing to say against its passage in the regular way.

Mr. KING. By that I understand the Senator to mean——

Mr. WARREN. I understand he has no objection whatever to the bill.

Mr. KING. Does the Interstate Commerce Committee approve of it affirmatively and not in a negative way?

Mr. WARREN. It never has been submitted to that committee for approval, and I do not know why it should be. It is under the law a shortage of an appropriation; it exists in the form of a deficiency, which we must in some manner make up.

Mr. KING. I did not understand that the entire amount was a deficiency, but that it was to meet——

Mr. WARREN. All of it is a deficiency, and I am sorry to say that we shall have more of this same kind of deficiency later on.

Mr. POMERENE. I think as one member of the Committee on Interstate Commerce I can say that we regret very much that there is such a deficiency, but we do not know how to escape it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMERICAN SOLDIERS' CEMETERY IN FRANCE.

Mr. SPENCER. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 122) authorizing a commission to acquire and maintain a cemetery in France in the name of the United States for the reception and interment of the bodies of American officers and men who lost their lives in connection with the European war, and to appropriate $500,000 therefor, and for other purposes.

Mr. President, this measure is the result of a bill which I introduced at the last session and a bill which was sent here by the War Department at the last session. The Committee on Military Affairs, taking the two bills, practically made this bill. It was reported at the last session and was passed by the Senate, but because of the expiration of the Congress it got no further. This bill is practically the same bill, with a verbal change, that was introduced and passed at the last session.

Mr. KING. Was the bill reported by the committee unanimously?

Mr. SPENCER. It was reported unanimously and placed on the calendar.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to ask the Senator whether the bill will lead to any discussion, because if it does I shall ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. SPENCER. I will withdraw the request if there is any discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business has been already temporarily laid aside.

Mr. SMOOT. I had not heard the request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill indicated by the Senator from Missouri?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That subject to the laws relative to national military cemeteries within the United States so far as such laws may be applicable, and subject to the permission of France, by treaty or otherwise, a commission shall be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire in the name of the United States a suitable plat of land in France, preferably on or near one of the important battle fields where American troops were conspicuously engaged, and there to establish a national cemetery, to be known as the American field of honor, and to properly prepare said plat of land for use as such and thereafter to care for, preserve, and maintain the same.

SEC. 2. That in said field of honor, in section 1 of this act provided for, may be buried, and shall only be buried, the remains of officers and members of and persons accompanying or serving with the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps who have died or hereafter shall die while serving with the overseas forces during the present war with Germany or during any period of occupation immediately subsequent thereto; and the Secretary of War is hereby directed to cause the remains of each of the persons aforesaid to be buried in said field: Provided, That nothing herein shall interfere with the return to the United States of the remains of any such officers or men whose nearest relative may desire such return to the United States.

SEC. 3. That for the purchase of the land and the original cost of the preparation thereof for use as a national cemetery, as in the first section of this act provided, and for the cost of transfer of remains and the interment thereof in said cemetery, as in the second section of this act provided, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $500,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary therefor.

SEC. 4. That the commission referred to in section 1 of this act shall consist of three Members of the Senate and three Members of the House of Representatives, appointed, respectively, by the Vice President and the Speaker of the House, who will become the permanent board to administer the cemetery and its maintenance. Vacancies shall be filled as in its original organization.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have no intention of opposing this bill. On the contrary, I shall vote for it with a great deal of pleasure. I rose, however, for the purpose of referring for a brief moment to the bill which has just been passed by the Senate without debate. It is the bill which appropriates $750,000,000 to enable the Government to meet the deficiency occasioned by its operation of the railroad systems of the United States. It was one of several large appropriation bills which had been reported from the committee and which were upon the calendar during the closing days of the last session. Those days were devoted to a general, indiscriminate, and long-continued discussion, ostensibly of one or more of the bills, but really of everything on earth except the substance of the bills. The reason assigned for their procedure at the time by gentlemen then occupying the attention of the Senate and the country was that these bills were of such transcendent importance that they involved questions and issues and considerations so vital to the welfare of the people of the country, with which they should be made acquainted in the fullest possible manner, that Senators were unable to square their conscience with their duty and permit those bills to pass without extended consideration. I note that the bill took just about five minutes for its presentation and passage to-day, and that not one of the Members of the Senate who were conspicuous in their opposition to the consideration and passage of these bills at the last session was present and in his seat at the time of the enactment of this great measure, carrying almost a billion dollars.

Mr. SMOOT. So that the Senate may know just why the bill was not passed at the last session of Congress, I wish to state that the reason of it was because the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], having the bill in charge, and the chairman of the Committee on Finance, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], would not allow the bill to be presented to the Senate, but used it to force, if possible, the passage of other bills, knowing that everyone wanted the passage of the appropriation bill containing the $750,000,000. I know myself that there were propositions made to those Senators that if they would bring the appropriation bill before the Senate it would pass in a very few moments, but it was refused and held back so as to try to force the other bills to passage.

Mr. THOMAS. While what the Senator has said may be true, which I neither affirm nor deny, I wish to call attention to the fact that two of the bills which at that time were upon the calendar have passed with almost as little difficulty and waste of time of the Senate as the one just disposed of.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] was on the committee with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] and myself. On account of illness the Senator from Virginia was not able to take charge of the deficiency bill entirely in the closing hours of the last session, and he left it to my charge to a large extent. Therefore I happen to know the facts.

When the bill carrying $750,000,000 came over from the House there was considerable objection in the committee to a vote on it and a good deal of criticism, but it developed that if the bill were reported to the Senate in the form it was reported at this session there would be an effort made to put a rider on it in the shape of legislation that would involve the long-and-short-haul clause with reference to railroad matters, and would have brought on interminable debate and an endless contest on the floor of this Chamber. We knew that; everybody knew that. If the bill had come in as it was reported at this session, as a separate bill, it would have been open to that amendment, and it was stated that that amendment would be made to the bill and other amendments made to it which would have probably resulted in its ultimate defeat; but if the amount of the appropriation should be put in the deficiency bill it would not be subject to those amendments.

The amount of this appropriation was reported in the deficiency bill, which everybody expected would have a fair opportunity to go through and become a law, and it would have gone through carrying this appropriation if there had not been a filibuster on the other side of the Chamber. That is the historic fact. Nobody can deny it. The RECORD shows it. I am not here to criticize other Senators. Every Senator has a free right to handle bills on the floor as he sees fit, and if Senators on the floor of the Senate desire to enter into endless debate at the close of a session and to destroy the life of a bill, that is their responsibility; they must assume it; and I am not here to criticize it.

In the absence of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], I am not willing to let the statement go on the floor that he was responsible for not bringing in the bill, when he was anxious to do so, and only put the provision on a deficiency bill because that was the direct line to secure its passage without having riders put on the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I made the statement I did in answer to a statement which was made by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. I do not think that the Senator from Virginia or the Senator from North Carolina would object to my statement if they had been present. There was no question but that the deficiency appropriation bill would have passed this body at the last session of Congress had not other bills been put ahead of it, and no other business could be attended to until they were disposed of.

Now, I will say to the Senator from Alabama that I took no part whatever in the filibuster. I was perfectly willing——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not saying that the Senator took part in the filibuster, but I say other Senators on his side of the Chamber did so, and they were responsible for the death of that bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I merely wanted the RECORD to show the fact. If I had had my way the bill would have passed; but I did feel that the real situation as it existed ought to have been stated.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. From what I have said I do not want to be understood as charging the filibuster to the Republican Party, because they were not responsible for it. The filibuster was conducted by three Members of the Senate. It is a fact that their affiliations are with the Republican Party, but the organization, I think, is as free from responsibility for it as is this side.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, in view of what has been said I think we might as well state in a word what the fact was and cease to indulge in camouflaging. The bill referred to was defeated by a filibuster conducted by certain Senators. There is no escape from that, and let us recognize the fact as such.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISTRIBUTION OF CAPTURED WAR TROPHIES.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If it is in order, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 10.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from New York to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Calendar Order No. 10. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I reserve the right to object. The understanding was that we would adjourn after the completion of the bill just under consideration and not displace the measure that is the unfinished business of the Senate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If the bill gives rise to debate, I am perfectly willing to agree not to press it for consideration this afternoon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest that the unfinished business will not be displaced if the bill suggested by the Senator from New York is taken up by unanimous consent.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 643) to provide for the equitable distribution of captured war devices and trophies to the States and Territories of the United States and to the District of Columbia.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to apportion and distribute pro rata among the several States and Territories of the United States and the District of Columbia, in corresponding ratio as the total number of men serving in the armed forces of the United States, as hereinafter provided, from each State or Territory and the District of Columbia bears to the total number of men so serving from all States and Territories and the District of Columbia, all cannon, gun carriages, machine guns, minenwerfers, mortars, bomb throwers, flame throwers, gas projectors, and other war devices and trophies captured by the armed forces of the United States from the armed forces of Germany and allied nations, with the exception of such cannon, gun carriages, machine guns, minenwerfers, mortars, bomb throwers, flame throwers, gas projectors, and other war devices and trophies as may be required for experimental purposes or for actual use by the armed forces of the United States; and the further exception of such of the devices aforementioned as may be required for display in museums of a national character or for monumental purposes in Arlington National Cemetery and in other national cemeteries, national parks, and national monuments wheresoever situated.

SEC. 2. That the apportionment and distribution provided for in this act shall be undertaken and completed as soon as practicable after the return of the aforementioned war devices and trophies to the United States; and that for the purposes of this act the Secretary of the United States Navy, or such person as he may direct, and The Adjutant General of the United States Army, shall separately or jointly compile or cause to be compiled a report or reports showing the number of men in the armed forces of the United States accredited to each State or Territory of the United States and to the District of Columbia, either by enlistment or by the process of the selective-service act, or otherwise drawn into and becoming an integral part of the armed forces of the United States during the period hereinafter specified, and that such report or reports shall be laid before the Secretary of War as soon as practicable after the passage of this act, and in no event later than six months from date hereof, and shall serve as the basis for the pro rata apportionment and distribution among the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, as hereinbefore provided.

SEC. 3. That in the case of the States and Territories the apportionment and distribution, as provided for in this act, shall be made through the governor or chief executive of each of the several States and Territories.

SEC. 4. That for the purposes of this act the term "in the armed forces of the United States," wherever used in this act, shall be construed to include all men enlisted, drafted, or otherwise drawn into and becoming an integral part of the United States Army, the United States Navy, the United States Marine Corps, the United States Coast Guard, and all other armed forces of the United States whatsoever; and that the period of service in the armed forces of the United States, as hereinbefore provided, shall be construed to begin with the effective date of the declaration of a state of war between the United States and Germany on April 6, 1917, and to end on the effective date of the armistice between the United States and Germany at 11 o'clock on November 11, 1918; and that the report or reports of men accredited to each of the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia shall be confined to the period between those two dates, inclusive.

SEC. 5. That all transportation charges on war devices and trophies, as indicated from point of shipment to point of final delivery within the several States, Territories, and counties thereof, and the District of Columbia, shall be borne by the United States Government, but not the expenses or costs incident to erection in local communities.

SEC. 6. That on and after the passage of this act no award or distribution of war devices or trophies captured during the period specified shall be made except as herein provided, and all legislation conflicting herewith is hereby repealed.

SEC. 7. That to carry out the provisions of this act there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be administered by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I have read the bill and I have listened to the reading of it by the Secretary, and I am very much in favor of its passage. As I understand the provisions of the bill, it will eliminate the necessity of several score of bills being considered for various communities. Let me ask the distinguished Senator if I have grasped the measure correctly? First, these war trophies, such as they may be, are to be distributed to the various States, and then the proper executive officer of the State is to distribute them to the various towns and cities as the State may see fit?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is correct.

Mr. ASHURST. It obviates, then, the necessity of passing at least 300 or 400 bills in cases where various communities are asking for war trophies.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think the Senator from Arizona underestimates the number of bills.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I also may ask the Senator from New York a question: I assume that this distribution by the governors of the several States will depend upon such powers as may be conferred upon them by the legislatures of the several States?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I assume the legislatures will legislate upon that topic.

Mr. POMERENE. Now, let me ask the Senator a further question. I have in mind now one request from a very excellent college in Ohio that had a very large number of students in the service. The president of the college wrote me sometime ago—I refer to the Mount Union College, of Alliance, Ohio—asking that one of the large guns be given to that college. I introduced here a bill to that effect. Is there anything in this bill which would preclude that college getting one of those cannons or guns?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I see nothing in this bill that would prevent that. If the governor of Ohio desires to give it to the college, I think he could do so under this bill.

Mr. POMERENE. But if the governor of Ohio did do that, would it be violative of any provision of this bill?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I know of no provision of this bill that would be violated by any such act. I call the Senator's attention to section 3, which is only four lines long, and which reads:

SEC. 3. That in the case of the States and Territories the apportionment and distribution, as provided for in this act, shall be made through the governor or chief executive of each of the several States and Territories.

Mr. POMERENE. Now, let me ask the Senator another question and, if I may, make a preliminary statement. There is a very large number of these heavy field guns and other military supplies which were captured by the Thirty-seventh Division, which was made up largely of Ohio troops. Of course, the troops from the other States rendered a similar service with similar success. Necessarily the Ohio soldiers would have a little bit more interest in the trophies captured by them than they would have in trophies which were captured by the troops of other States, and it seems to me that due regard ought to be had to that fact when it comes to the distribution of these different military supplies. Is that provided for in the bill?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is not specifically provided for in the bill, but I should think that an intelligent administration of this act would prompt the Federal authorities to see to it that whenever it is possible the trophies assigned to a given State shall be the trophies captured by the troops from that State.

Mr. POMERENE. Why could there not be an amendment offered declaring the purpose of Congress in that behalf now?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think it would be rather difficult to draft legislation to meet that requirement. We might get into difficulties if we tried to make that a rigid requirement under the law.

Mr. POMERENE. I realize very well that could not be done, but if there were some statement declaring the purpose of Congress in that behalf as a guide to the military department when they come to the distribution of the various trophies, I think it would be desirable. I can understand, for instance, that where there was a division containing one regiment from New York, another regiment from Ohio, and another regiment from Pennsylvania, all of them rendering most loyal and efficient service, the trophies should be distributed among those several States in proportion, perhaps, to the number of troops engaged.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think that is a matter which can be easily handled by an intelligent administration and by adjustment of the situation between the several governors and the War Department. It seems to me that in making up the apportionment of the trophies to go to the several States, the War Department, if it operates at all intelligently, will take that into consideration. It certainly should, and perhaps the very discussion which the Senator has initiated here this afternoon will indicate the temper of the Senate upon it. It is, however, a very difficult question upon which to legislate.

Mr. POMERENE. I may say that Gen. Farnsworth, in charge of the Thirty-seventh Division, has already made recommendation to that effect, as I understand, to the War Department, and I have no doubt it will be respected.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And undoubtedly the other division commanders and members of other divisions will make similar suggestions on many occasions.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I do not know that I understood the Senator from Ohio. Is it his idea that trophies should be divided up in proportion to the captures by the various troops?

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, no; I did not say that. That does not quite express my thought.

Mr. McKELLAR. I merely wish to suggest to the Senator that if we divide the trophies in that way it would probably be unfair. Take, for instance, the case of Sergt. Alvin C. York, of my State. He would be entitled to practically all the machine guns there are. It seems that he captured on one occasion most of this character of guns the Germans had. Of course, under these circumstances it would hardly be generous on the part of Tennessee, as the home of this gallant and remarkable soldier, to demand all that he captured, and I think that we can well afford to be considerate of our less fortunate sister States and divide the machine guns on the basis as provided in the bill.

Mr. POMERENE. I am quite willing that Sergt. York shall have all the German prisoners he captured.

Mr. McKELLAR. And all the machine guns?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; and all the machine guns. He should have them.

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree with the Senator absolutely in that regard.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. KENYON. Before the motion is agreed to I should like to inquire if the unfinished business is now before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. SMOOT. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 2 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, June 16, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate June 12, 1919.

UNITED STATES MARSHALS.

Bruce Alexander to be United States marshal, northern district of Mississippi.

Floyd Loper to be United States marshal, southern district of Mississippi.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, June 12, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, our Father in heaven, for the wise, the true, the noble men, who have witnessed the terrible disasters which a world-wide war has left in its wake, who are striving to form a league of nations to prevent its recurrence in all future.

Let those who object to a league of nations visit Arlington, our national cemeteries, and those in France where our American dead lie in abundance. Let them witness the wounded and maimed, with arms, legs, eyes, health, gone; ponder these unsightly scenes before they lift their voices against those who would prevent such scenes and think twice before they speak.

Above all, let the religious denominations lay aside their petty creeds and unwarranted dogmas and unite on the common ground of humanity to uphold and sustain peace among the sons of men, for God's sake, for Christ's sake, for humanity's sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Naval Affairs I report the bill making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes, together with the accompanying report.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

MEMORIAL OF CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF PORTO RICO.

Mr. DAVILA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a memorial addressed to me by the Chamber of Commerce of Porto Rico dealing with the matter of the improvement of harbors in the island.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Porto Rico asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a memorial. Is there objection?

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the length of this memorial?

Mr. DAVILA. It is a memorial dealing with the improvement of harbors in Porto Rico.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

APPOINTMENT.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House, according to the provisions of the act of June 10, 1872, the following appointment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. TEMPLE, of Pennsylvania, to be a member of the Board of Directors of the Columbia Hospital for Women and Lying-in Asylum.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

The SPEAKER. In accordance with the order of yesterday, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEELE] is recognized for 20 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, out of regard for the wishes of those who are charged with the Army appropriation bill and who desire to speed the passage of that bill, I have asked only for the minimum time, and therefore will have to ask that I be allowed to proceed without interruption; and for the same reason, Mr. Speaker, I ask that I may be given unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, last week this House by a unanimous vote passed a resolution authorizing the appointment of a committee of 15 to investigate the war-time expenditures of the War Department. Yesterday the House by a like vote, in order to show the scope which that investigation will likely assume, gave its consent to the unlimited use of funds in making that investigation, the idea being, as stated by former Speaker CLARK yesterday, that this investigation should be most thorough in all its aspects. The only surprise to me in connection with this resolution was that it was limited to the expenditures of the War Department, for my thought is that if investigation is to be made it should not only be thorough as to that department, but thorough as to all other departments and bureaus of the Government having charge of the expenditures of war appropriations. I am told, however, it is the purpose of the majority to introduce such resolutions in the near future. In the discussion of this resolution it was interesting to note the reasons given by the majority for the passage of the resolution. As stated by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], it was:

If in this riot of expenditure induced by the war there has been extravagance, if the extravagance was such that it could not be avoided, the country will probably excuse it. If it could have been avoided, there is no reason why the country should not know it.

Similar reasons were given by others in speaking in behalf of the majority of this House. The reasons that were given on behalf of the majority for the passage of this resolution, then, reduce themselves to the allegation of extravagance.

There was no specific charge at all during this discussion of any fraud or corruption in connection with these expenditures. Just what this investigation may develop, as stated by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] yesterday, no one can prophesy at this time; but, so far as we know at the present time, the sum and substance of the allegations is that there was extravagance.

Now, the great outstanding fact of this whole war proposition is that this country was successful in its aims, and successful where our enemies did not believe it was possible for us to be successful. Balancing all of the considerations growing out of the entire conflict, it shows that the decided advantage to our arms is an equivalent for all other considerations in the matter; and that extravagance was likely to be one of the features of such a situation is not at all a new feature of wars. All wars are extravagant, all wars are wasteful, and that has been the history of wars from the Roman times down to the present. Not only are they wasteful, but the incidents growing out of them breed waste and breed extravagance.

The fact is that we were absolutely unprepared for this war, and we were not only unprepared for the war but it was thought at that time it was necessary to prepare for a prolonged war, and this situation was well stated a few weeks ago by Admiral Sims in a victory loan speech which he made in Philadelphia, where he said:

Mistakes, of course, have been made in the Army. They could not be avoided. I am sure you will be interested to hear my mistakes. Well, you will learn them in the inevitable after-war investigation. You will probably hear then that I spent too much money over there. True. If the Germans had given me six months' notice as to when they were going to quit, I would have spent no more than necessary. The expenses to which I have just referred were indeed vital. We had to prepare for a prolonged war.

Now, in view of the discussion which has taken place in the House at various times growing out of the expenditures of the present war, I thought it might be interesting to indulge for a brief time in a discussion of the lessons of other wars in this particular, and the only other war in our history which would bear any resemblance to the one through which we have just passed is the Civil War. That war also was one which arose suddenly. It was a great emergency, and the preparations for it had to be made quickly. It lasted almost double the time that this war has lasted, so far as we are concerned, and therefore it may have given rise to conditions which would not have existed to that same degree if it had ended more speedily. But the conditions were quite similar. And in referring to these conditions I do not wish to be understood for a moment as intending to reflect upon the honesty or integrity of the Government during that period of war. Everybody will concede that President Lincoln came out of that war as one of the greatest figures in the world's history, absolutely stainless in his record. [Applause.] Neither do I wish in any degree to reflect upon the integrity or honesty of Secretary of War Stanton, whose unbending honesty was recognized at all times and who endeavored to the best of his ability to ferret out any malfeasance which existed during that period of time. On the contrary, he gave all the assistance that was possible for him to do to bring all the malefactors to justice that existed during that period of time. And I also wish to give full credit to the leaders of the party in power during the Civil War, who were big enough and brave enough at that time to denounce, whenever it came to their notice, any attempt to reach illegally into the Public Treasury. But notwithstanding this ability and honesty on the part of the heads of the Government the fact existed that in the subordinates of that administration at that time there existed during the war-time period a perfect carnival of fraud. And this notwithstanding, as I say, all their vigilance, which escaped their power of detection or ability to stop.

The difficulty in obtaining honest administration does not lie with the high executive officers, but with the system under which a small peace establishment is suddenly called upon to enter into enormous transactions to sustain a great world war, for which the establishment is wholly inadequate. Under these circumstances new and inexperienced subordinates are hastily called, and much is necessarily left to their discretion, with the result that the man who secures a Government contract is generally regarded as being on the high road to wealth.

And therefore, so far as the head officers of the administration are concerned, it is absolutely impossible in such a period of time, it seems to me, to absolutely ferret out the misdoings of subordinates or, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] said yesterday, the underlings of the Government. And this lack of honest administration which occurred during the Civil War occurred quite early during the history of that war. It was known to the public a few months after Fort Sumter was fired upon.

Two States soon thereafter, in their legislatures, passed resolutions upon the subject. The Michigan Legislature, by a resolution of January 11, 1862, mentioning the charge that "traitors in the disguise of patriots have plundered our Treasury, destroyed our substance, paralyzed our efforts, by a system of fraud and peculation," asked for legislation making such commission of fraud a felony punishable by imprisonment for years or for life or even by death upon the gallows.

The Ohio Legislature one month later regarded with surprise, anxious alarm, pain, and regret "the evidences that have reached us and the disclosures that have been made in Congress of wastefulness, fraud, and peculations, based upon deep corruption among the subordinate agents of our National Government in connection with the supplies for the Army," and asked Congress to provide suitable and effective laws against all manner of fraud.

And in the citations which I shall make now they shall all be from those who were supporters of the administration at that time, and not a single one will be given from those who were opponents of that administration.

Secretary Stanton appointed a commission to adjust claims against the War Department. Before making their report, July 1, 1862, they had secured deductions of nearly $17,000,000 from claims amounting to $60,000,000.

A special Senate committee (Rept. No. 84, 37th Cong.) reported that they had discovered "gigantic and shameless frauds on the Government"; that they "are overwhelmed with astonishment and sorrow by the revelations which have been made." This report gave the following as an example of what was undoubtedly occurring in other departments of the Government. "A Prussian by birth, an Israelite by descent, a peddler and horse jockey by profession," who is selling horses to the Government, has made illicit profits by bribing an inspector and three Government clerks, turns up as an extensive shipowner (though comparatively poor a few months earlier), chartering 13 transports to the War Department. These transports cost him $65,000, but at the rate per diem of charter the committee estimated that if the engagement lasted a year his net profit would be $293,000. There were frauds also in the Navy Department, a common mode of which is illustrated by the following statement made by Senator Grimes April 12, 1864 (Cong. Globe, 1521), in the Senate. Phelps, Dodge & Co., a large house in New York City dealing in metals, proposed to furnish tin at 29 cents per pound, which they considered a low price. Their bid was rejected, but a naval contractor afterwards bought from them the same lot at their price of 29 cents and turned it in to the Navy Department at 27 cents, the bid which had secured the contract. The contractor made his profit by cheating the Government in false weight, which he was enabled to do by corrupting the agent and master mechanic who were to receive the tin. Senator Grimes, in the Senate, May 23, 1864 (Globe, 2406), showed how oils were adulterated and how fictitious bidding had been reduced to a science. He maintained that frequently the civil engineer or master workman at the navy yard who made the estimate was in collusion with the contractor; that "Navy agents, clerks, master workmen, inspectors, and other servants of the Government have been debauched by bribes, promises, and threats in order to secure prompt payment of bills and to induce them to receive and pay for short measure, weight, and count." In April, 1862 (Globe, 1841), Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, said there was indubitable evidence that somebody had plundered the Public Treasury well nigh, in a single year, as much as the entire current yearly expense of the Government which the people hurled from power because of its corruption.

The yearly expense of the Government to which he referred was something like $80,000,000, and this amount Mr. Dawes stated had been plundered during the first year of the war.

In the Senate, on January 14, 1862, Senator Trumbull, quoting from the testimony of the House committee, said that Hall's carbines, originally owned by the Government, but condemned and sold as useless at about $2 each, were purchased back for the Government in April or May, at $15 each. In June the Government sold them again at $3.50 each. Afterwards, in August, they were purchased by an agent for the Government at $12.50 each, and turned over to the Government at $22 each, and the committee of the House finally succeeded in preventing the last payment from being made. On the 13th of January, 1862 (Globe, 298), Dawes referred to certain purchases of cavalry horses, as follows:

"A regiment of cavalry has just reached Louisville, 1,000 strong, and a board of Army officers has condemned 485 of the 1,000 horses as utterly worthless. The man who examined those horses declared upon his oath that there is not one of them worth $20. They are blind, spavined, ringboned, with the heaves, with the glanders, and with every disease that horseflesh is heir to. Those 485 horses cost the Government, before they were mustered into the service, $58,200, and it cost the Government to transport them from Pennsylvania to Louisville $10,000 more before they were condemned and cast off.

"There are, sir, 83 regiments of cavalry, 1,000 strong, now in or roundabout the Army. It costs $250,000 to put one of those regiments upon its feet before it marches a step. Twenty millions of dollars have thus far been expended upon these cavalry regiments before they left the encampments in which they were gathered and mustered into the service. They have come here and then some of them have been sent back to Elmira; they have been sent back to Annapolis; they have been sent here and they have been sent there to spend the winter, and many of the horses that were sent back have been tied to posts and to trees within the District of Columbia, and there left to starve to death. A guide can take you around the District of Columbia to-day to hundreds of carcasses of horses chained to trees, where they have pined away, living on bark and limbs till they starve and die, and the Committee for the District of Columbia have been compelled to call for legislation here to prevent the city wherein we are assembled from becoming an equine Golgotha."

Referring to this extract, Horace White, in his Life of Lyman Trumbull, says:

"Horse contracts of this sort had been so plentiful that Government officials had gone about the streets of Washington with their pockets full of them. Some of these contracts had been used to pay Cameron's political debts and to cure old political feuds, and banquets had been given with the proceeds, 'when the hatchet of political animosity,' said Dawes, 'was buried in the grave of public confidence and the national credit was crucified between malefactors.'"

Not only were these frauds in Government contracts but also in connection with the filling of military quotas by substitute brokers and bounty jumpers. Roscoe Conkling, in the House on April 24, 1866 (Globe, 2151), declared that the Provost Marshal General and his subordinates had "turned this business of recruiting and drafting into one carnival of corrupt disorder, into a paradise of coxcombs and thieves. * * * There never has been in human history a greater mockery and a greater burlesque upon honest administration than the conduct of this bureau, taking the whole country together." Gov. Brough, of Ohio, wrote on February 6, 1865, as follows: "I am satisfied that there is more or less corruption in at least one-half of the subordinate provost marshalships of the State. * * * I know the fact that some men of heretofore moderate means have retired from these positions with handsome competencies, while some remaining in them are manifestly outward tokens of worldly means not derived from salaries." Brough and Senator Wilson, of Massachusetts, charged that corruption extended to the surgeons, who examined drafted men in order to ascertain whether they were fit physically for the service. Men would feign deafness, blindness, cardiac disease, and other disabilities, and some surgeons would write out certificates of exemption on receipt of a substantial fee.

In line with this mass of evidence is a startling article written by Col. Henry S. Olcott in Annals of the War, page 723.

Col. Olcott drew his data to a large extent from contemporary reports which he made to the Secretary of War. He was a native of New York, and at the outbreak of the Civil War was one of the editors of the New York Tribune. He went to the front during the first year of the war, joined the Burnside expedition at Annapolis, participated at the capture of Roanoke Island, the Battle of Newbern, the siege and capture of Fort Macon, the battles on the Rappahannock during Pope's retreat, and other military affairs. Exposure to malaria finally disabled him with fever, and two months later, when convalescent, he was appointed by Secretary Stanton to investigate the condition of military arsenals, disbursing offices, and so forth, and brought to light much corruption. Later he performed similar service in exposing the abuses in navy yards, being officially commissioned by the Navy Department for this purpose. He was one of a committee of three appointed to arrest the assassins of President Lincoln and to take evidence against the conspirators. He served as special commissioner of the War and Navy Departments until his retirement in 1866.

He prefaced his article, first published in 1879, by a statement of the absolute unpreparedness of the Government for war, and that all considerations of business caution had to be subordinated to the imperious necessity for haste. "If," he says, "it was the golden hour of patriotism, so was it equally that of greed." And in the course of his article he said:

"The rush of men to the front left the war office no time to be nice over details, so that as the volume of administrative business overflowed the bureau machinery for its supervision things were, in a measure, suffered to take their course. An unhealthy tone pervaded everything; speculation was the rule, conservatism the exception. We floated, on a sea of paper, into a fool's paradise. Contractors, bloated with the profits on shoddy, rode in emblazoned carriages which a little while before they would have been glad to drive as hirelings, and vulgar faces and grimy fingers were made more vulgar and coarse with the glare of great diamonds. Intrigue held the key to the kitchen stairs of the White House, shaped legislation, sat cheek by jowl with Congressmen, and seduced commissioned officers from the strict path of duty. Our sailors were sent to sea in ships built of green timber, which were fitted with engines good only for the junk shop and greased with "sperm" oil derived from mossbunkers and the fat of dead horses. For 1 pound of necessary metals, 1 yard of fabric, 1 gallon of liquid the price of 2 was paid. Our soldiers were given guns that would not shoot, powder that would only half explode, shoes of which the soles were filled with shavings, hats that dissolved often in a month's showers, and clothing made of old cloth ground up and fabricated over again.

"In the navy yards there was a system of corrupt bargaining between the public servants and contractors under which goods of inferior quality and short of quantity were accepted as of the lawful standard and count; public property was purloined and carried off in open daylight; scores of superfluous men were quartered on the pay roll by politicians; Navy agents colluded with ring contractors to buy of them all supplies at highest market rates on an agreement for a 15 per cent commission, and clerks in the yards, for a consideration, would slip the pay requisitions of these ring thieves from the bottom to the top of the pile that awaited the official certificate of approval, so that they might draw their money at once, to the prejudice of honest dealers. There was no such thing as the taking of a general account of stock—not even a keeping of the accounts by double entry. The old regular officers in charge of bureaus, high-toned and unsuspicious, were flattered into a fatal sense of security by subordinates bound body and soul to thieves.

"In the military arsenals the same rottenness prevailed. Here and there were to be found public servants without a moral ulcer in their breasts, but such were annoyed and hampered in the execution of duty, overridden, too, often by positive orders from superiors to receive supplies not up to Army standards, and when too obstinate were removed to posts less desirable. The Army standards were themselves debased under the plea of an exigency. In the lettings of contracts a fair competition was frustrated by the transparent conspiracy of bidders, who would put in absurdly low proposals under fictitious names and then bid themselves at the highest price that from surreptitious information obtained they knew would throw out honest competitors and secure them the contract. Their profits were calculated to come out of the delivery of inferior articles of skimped measure to Government inspectors with whom they had an understanding. Presents of horses, carriages, jewelry, wines, cigars, and friendly help toward promotion, though passing under a politer name than bribery, effected the same results as though they had not. Every artifice that rascally ingenuity could devise and clever men and women carry out was resorted to to procure the brigadier's stars or the colonel's eagles for ambitious incompetents. The sacredest secrets of our Government were sold to the enemy, loud-mouthed hypocrites trafficked across the lines, the very medicines for the sick were adulterated, and dishonest gains were made out of the transportation of the wounded. Nay, so vile was the scramble for money, so debasing its influence, that our dead heroes were followed into the very grave by the plundering contractor, who cheated in the coffin that was to hold the sacred dust, and amassed fortunes by supplying rotten headstones in defiance of accepted stipulations. What shall we call this wretched episode of national history but a carnival of fraud? This was the Augean stable to cleanse which the broom of authority was placed in my hands."

He concludes his article with the following astonishing statement:

"It is my deliberate conviction, based upon the inspection of many bureaus and the examination of some thousands of witnesses in every walk of life, that at least 20, if not 25 per cent of the entire expenditures of the Government during the Rebellion were tainted with fraud. That is to say, that over $700,000,000 were paid to public robbers or worse than wasted through improvident methods. If the loss of the money were the only thing to be deplored it would be comparatively a trifling affair, for this country has boundless resources and unprecedented recuperative capacities. But every dollar of this ill-spent treasure contributed toward a demoralization of the people and the sapping of ancient virtues."

James Russell Lowell, who held a brief for the war, writing in 1865, philosophized over this amazing record as follows:

"It is true that by the side of self-devotion and public spirit the vices and meannesses of troubled times appear as they will and must. We have had shoddy, we have had contracts, we have had substitute brokerage, we have had speculators in patriotism and, still worse, in military notoriety. Men have striven to make the blood of our martyrs the seed of wealth or office; but in times of public and universal extremity, when habitual standards of action no longer serve and ordinary currents of thought are swamped in the flood of enthusiasm or excitement, it always happens that the evil passions of some men are stimulated by what serves only to exalt the nobler qualities of others. In such epochs evil as well as good is exaggerated. A great social convulsion shakes up the lees which underlie society, forgotten because quiescent, and the stimulus of calamity brings out the extremes of human nature, whether for good or evil."

While it is undoubtedly true that war time brings out the extremes of good and evil, it is also true that every age has its own moral ideals and conception of right and wrong. Unfortunately, evil was rampant from the very beginning to the close of the Civil War. The careful Washington correspondent of the Springfield Republican, long a resident of the Capital, wrote in May, 1864: "Washington was never quite so villainously corrupt as at the present time. In the palmy days of southern rule of slavery there was not half the corruption there is now." And Robert C. Winthrop, a former Speaker of this House, in a public address delivered about the same time, referred to "the flood of vice and crime, of immorality and irreligion, which is sweeping so wildly over the land." But the evils of this period were righted in subsequent years, for the Nation was sound at heart, and when it came to the present war a higher standard prevailed.

None but supporters of the Lincoln administration have been cited to show the fraud and corruption that prevailed at that time. It is to the great credit of the leaders of that administration that they were big enough and brave enough to denounce corrupt practices when they discovered them. The contrast, however, between the two periods is most marked. It is the difference between a "villainously corrupt" Washington and a Washington charged with extravagance.

Within a few months after the firing on Fort Sumter, in April, 1861, the public became aware that gross frauds were being perpetrated upon the Public Treasury. Nine months thereafter a Cabinet minister was dismissed and the legislatures of two States adopted resolutions referring to disclosures in Congress "of wastefulness, fraud, and peculation based upon deep corruption."

It is now more than two years since war was declared against Germany and seven months since an armistice was signed. During this war period expenditures were authorized by the practically unanimous vote of both Democrats and Republicans, amounting to more than five times the entire cost of the four-year Civil War period. The difference between the two periods has already been mentioned. It is not due to the mere fact that different political parties were in power during the two war periods, but to the noteworthy historical change in the standards of business and public morality, which is to the everlasting credit of the American people.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Army bill. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 5227, the Army appropriation bill, with Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Army appropriation bill. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5227) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Purchase of subsistence supplies: For issue as rations to troops, including enlisted men of the Regular Army Reserve and retired enlisted men when ordered to active duty, civil employees when entitled thereto, hospital matrons, nurses, applicants for enlistment while held under observation, general prisoners of war (including Indians held by the Army as prisoners, but for whose subsistence appropriation is not otherwise made), Indians employed with the Army as guides and scouts, and general prisoners at posts; for the subsistence of the masters, officers, crews, and employees of the vessels of the Army transport service; hot coffee for troops traveling when supplied with cooked or travel rations; meals for recruiting parties and applicants for enlistment while under observation; for sales to officers, including members of the Officers' Reserve Corps while on active duty, and enlisted men of the Army: Provided, That the sum of $12,000 is authorized to be expended for supplying meals or furnishing commutation of rations to enlisted men of the Regular Army and the National Guard who may be competitors in the national rifle match: Provided further, That no competitor shall be entitled to commutation of rations in excess of $1.50 per day, and when meals are furnished no greater expense than that sum per man per day for the period the contest is in progress shall be incurred. For payments: Of commutation of rations to the cadets of the United States Military Academy in lieu of the regular established ration, at the rate of 68 cents per ration; of the regulation allowances of commutation in lieu of rations to enlisted men on furlough, enlisted men and male and female nurses when stationed at places where rations in kind can not be economically issued, including enlisted men of the Regular Army Reserve and retired enlisted men when ordered to active duty, and when traveling on detached duty where it is impracticable to carry rations of any kind, enlisted men selected to contest for places or prizes in departments and Army rifle competitions while traveling to and from places of contest, male and female nurses on leave of absence, applicants for enlistment, and general prisoners while traveling under orders. For payment of the regulation allowances of commutation in lieu of rations for members of the Nurse Corps (female) while on duty in hospital, and for enlisted men, applicants for enlistment while held under observation, civilian employees who are entitled to subsistence at public expense, and general prisoners sick therein, to be paid to the surgeon in charge; advertising; for providing prizes to be established by the Secretary of War for enlisted men of the Army who graduate from the Army schools for bakers and cooks, the total amount of such prizes at the various schools not to exceed $900 per annum; for other necessary expenses incident to the purchase, testing, care, preservation, issue, sale, and accounting for subsistence supplies for the Army, $90,000,000.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the word "advertising" on line 10 of page 21. I do so just for the purpose of asking a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment may not be offered while the point of order is pending.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the chairman of the committee a question or two about "advertising," on page 21, line 10. The question arises from the statement made recently in the newspapers that $185,000 would be expended for advertising purposes to secure enlistments. I wanted to ask whether this had reference to that?

Mr. KAHN. No. This has reference to the advertising of bids for food for the soldiers. This item is altogether about subsistence, and it would not refer in any way to advertising for enlistments.

Mr. FESS. I will state to the chairman that I shall not make the point of order on the word if that is the purpose.

Mr. KAHN. That is the purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] withdraws his reservation of the point of order, and the Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KAHN: Amend, page 21, line 17, by striking out "$90,000,000" and inserting "$67,500,000."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the amendment is this: The committee yesterday reduced the Army to an average strength of 300,000 men, instead of the 400,000 men recommended by the Committee on Military Affairs. Therefore the matter of subsistence for the Army can be reduced correspondingly. That is the purpose of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Delaware moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. LAYTON. I have risen, Mr. Chairman, to make an inquiry which I think is very appropriate under this heading of "Subsistence." I would like to ask the chairman of the committee, who I understand was also a member of the same committee in the Sixty-fifth Congress, whether there was any lack of appropriations at any time for the buying of supplies for the Army and Navy in the military equipment of the country?

Mr. KAHN. I am quite positive that there was no lack of appropriations, for if the Army and Navy appropriation bills did not carry the necessary amounts, the Committee on Appropriations promptly furnished deficiency appropriations, and all the money that was required for furnishing supplies of every kind to the Army as well as the Navy was forthcoming under the various appropriation bills.

Mr. LAYTON. That was my impression, Mr. Chairman; and the point I want to make is that my constituents, engaged in packing tomatoes, are very anxious to understand why they can not be paid for last year's tomato pack. Those men had the price fixed on them by the War Department authorities, as to the price of the tomatoes in the field, and the Government then commandeered a certain portion of the entire pack for its use.

Mr. MCKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Delaware yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. LAYTON. Yes.

Mr. MCKENZIE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Delaware whether or not there is any question about the goods he mentions coming up to the specifications laid down by the War Department?

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, there has never been any question about a Delaware product coming up to the specifications at any time, so far as that is concerned. [Applause.] We grow the finest tomatoes and the finest fruit on earth, and we have in our State the finest packing establishments, that know how to put up Triple-X products. There is no objection raised by the department, as I understand from the inquiries I have made, as to any failure to come up to the standard, but there has simply been a delay in paying these people for their pack. Now this is a great hardship. Our packers as a general rule, in order to get liquid capital, go to the banks and borrow money at 6 per cent, in order to take advantage of spot cash for the tins out of which the cans are made, and in order to pay their labor and pay the farmer for his fruit.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAYTON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KAHN. Do the people in the War Department give any reason why the gentleman's constituents are not being paid?

Mr. LAYTON. I have never been able to ascertain any reason. Several days ago I wrote a letter to the Secretary of War asking for an explanation, but I have received none up to this time. I want to say that these people go to the banks to get their liquid capital in order to take advantage of the market for spot-cash tins, and in order to pay their labor and in order to pay the farmer for his products. They borrowed that money last year. The Government is not paying them any interest at all upon what it commandeered, and it is a great hardship. They stand to-day on the threshold of another packing season. They have got to go and borrow money again, and it is a matter which in my judgment justifies my calling attention to it at this time for the purpose of a public inquiry.

Mr. CANNON. I should like to be heard a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment?

Mr. CANNON. Yes. I want to ask the gentleman a question. This is for the subsistence of the Army. How much is the appropriation for the current year?

Mr. KAHN. It is considerably above the amount that they are asking in this bill.

Mr. CANNON. I want to ask this: Not being present all the time yesterday, I see in glancing at the RECORD that the time of the House for an hour or two yesterday was taken up in a debate about the supplies for the Army. Having hastily glanced at the RECORD, I judge from that debate that there must be enough supplies of one kind and another to take care of the Army for the coming fiscal year. I do not know as to that. Has the committee taken into consideration what is on hand?

Mr. KAHN. Yes. Of course, the supplies that are being sold or are to be sold by the commissioner of sales are for the most part not food supplies. They are other materials, including acids, locomotive cranes, and things of that kind. The Quartermaster General stated to the committee, not in this session but in the previous session of Congress, when we were considering the appropriation bill last winter, that there would not be any considerable quantity of food material left for the subsistence of the Army, practically, after the 1st of July; that the articles of subsistence were being used right along and that their surplus was being depleted rapidly. I think that is practically true of everything except the meat products.

Mr. CANNON. Everything except the meat products?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Then I take it that much of the conversation that was had yesterday about the packers, and about people being protected in order to hold up prices, and so on, was just talk.

Mr. KAHN. A good deal of it. I want to say to the gentleman that I have last year's appropriation bill, and I find the amount that was allowed then was $552,868,390, and that sum was supplemented by deficiency appropriations reported from the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. CANNON. I notice there was much talk yesterday about meat. Whether it was wise or unwise, or whether it elicited information I do not know; but if we have got plenty of meat products they ought not to be sold, but ought to be kept for the subsistence of the Army, and that would mean a decrease in the amount of this appropriation.

Mr. KAHN. That, of course, is not appropriated for in this item. In other words, the War Department, instead of apportioning money for meat products under the appropriation, does not apportion any sum for meat products. The gentleman knows the Army appropriation bill has been in this form for many years and the estimates are sent to the committee so as to show the specific amount for every single item in the paragraph. I understand that for meat products they are not asking any money, and no money is included in the total for that.

Mr. CANNON. I have an impression, however, that while this is for subsistence, and while various items are referred to, if this bill follows former bills—I have not examined as to whether it does or not——

Mr. KAHN. It does.

Mr. CANNON. There is a clause that puts the whole thing into a hodgepodge.

Mr. KAHN. There is a clause a little later on in the bill which covers such items as subsistence, transportation, regular supplies, and so on.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

By unanimous consent the time of Mr. CANNON was extended five minutes.

Mr. KAHN. During the war practically every item of the bill was included in that catch-all phrase or paragraph, the purpose being that if there should be a deficiency in some particular item in the bill they would not have to come to Congress for a deficiency, but could use any excess moneys that might have been appropriated for the other items to make up the amount.

Mr. CANNON. Is the same thing true in this bill?

Mr. KAHN. No; we have restricted that part of the bill to the paragraphs that were formerly in the bill before we got into the war.

Mr. CANNON. So they can not throw it all into a pot and transfer from one to the other?

Mr. KAHN. No; only for some half dozen items, but not all. The gentleman will find it on page 39, at line 18, of the bill.

Mr. CANNON. It throws half a dozen into a bulk item.

Mr. KAHN. Exactly. That language was included in the bill for many years before we got into the war.

Mr. CANNON. I will express the hope that there will be nothing sold that is on hand, that we heard so much about yesterday, judging from the RECORD; that nothing will be sold at a smaller price than it can be bought for now, that will be necessary for the support of the Army for the coming fiscal year.

Mr. KAHN. I want to say to the gentleman that they have a very large surplus of canned products, and after six months there is a possibility that some of those canned products may become blown and spoiled. Therefore they are trying to sell the surplus as speedily as possible, but they will keep enough to supply the Army for the fiscal year 1920.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, this bill as it was reported to the House carried something above $809,000,000. The appropriation thus made did not, however, nearly cover the anticipated cost of the Army for the fiscal year. In the matter of subsistence, the item now under consideration, the cost of the maintenance of an army of 300,000 is very much greater than the sum carried in the bill. The committee did not appropriate, I assume, the full sum necessary for subsistence, in view of the fact that a large portion of the subsistence will be drawn out of the stores now on hand. So the cost of the maintenance of the Army which is proposed, either an army of 400,000 as originally proposed, or 300,000 or 350,000 which may be determined on, will be very much greater in many items than the sums carried in this bill.

In other words, whatever the bill may carry when agreed upon, whether $700,000,000 or $800,000,000, it will not measure the cost of the Army for the year. How much will it cost? I rise to propound that inquiry to the chairman of the committee. I do not know whether the committee has had the time to carefully examine the various items of subsistence, of regular supplies, horses, munitions, material, clothing, and equipment, equipage of various kinds, to determine the difference between the amount carried in the bill and the cost of these articles that will be consumed by the Army which we are providing for.

If the committee has not had time to do that I hope before the consideration of the bill is concluded that a statement may be made giving us, at least approximately, what will be the actual cost of the Army provided for—not only the cost in money appropriated in this bill, but the cost in the stores drawn upon and not provided for in the bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the committee has figured down about as close mathematically as it can be done the cost of subsistence, figuring for an army of 300,000 men for one year, and the present cost of a ration is 56 cents a day. Figuring it 60 cents a day will give $65,700,000.

Mr. MONDELL. Do I understand that the committee is appropriating in this bill as though we were going to restore to the accumulated stores all of the subsistence that may be required?

Mr. ANTHONY. No.

Mr. MONDELL. If it is not, and I assume that it is not, then, of course, the appropriation carried in this bill does not cover the total cost of subsistence for the Army of the size you are proposing.

The question is, How much more will the Army which you propose, or the Army that we may ultimately agree upon, cost—how much more will it cost than the appropriations carried in the bill? No one can make an absolutely correct statement relative to that fact, but an approximation can be made.

The time of Mr. MONDELL having expired, by unanimous consent he was given two minutes more.

Mr. MONDELL. The committee ought to be able to make an approximation of the actual cost of the Army that shall be determined upon by adding to the various items in this bill the difference between the appropriations made and the actual value of the articles that will be used for the Army of the size we propose. If it is going to cost $1,200,000,000 for the Army we propose, rather than seven or eight hundred million carried in the bill, we ought to know approximately what the amount is to be. In other words, when word goes out to the American people how much the proposed Army will cost it should be stated, not in terms of the appropriation, but in terms of the cost, by adding to the appropriation the value of the material and supplies that will be used, but not paid for out of these appropriations.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the statement of the gentleman from Wyoming is correct. The amount carried in the bill does not show the total cost of the Army. The gentleman suggests that we put into the RECORD what the total cost will be before we conclude the bill. I submit that it is practically impossible to do that.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. In a moment. The Democratic members of the Committee on Military Affairs were named on the 26th day of May. On the 27th the committee met and concluded to take this bill as the basis for its legislation. On Wednesday the Public Printer was printing it, and on Thursday the committee met to take up the hearings. It had hearings all day Thursday, all day Friday, all day Saturday, all day Monday, all day Tuesday, all day Wednesday; and on Thursday it commenced the executive consideration of the bill for the amount to be allowed for each item. It met all day Thursday, all day Friday, and finished the bill. The bill was reported to the House on Saturday, and was taken up for consideration on this floor on Monday.

I think that is very expeditious work, and I want to thank my colleagues on the committee for the splendid manner in which they have cooperated in bringing this bill speedily on the floor of the House.

Now, the question asked by the gentleman from Wyoming will be given every attention, and I ask the unanimous consent of the House that I may be allowed to extend my remarks in the RECORD, so that I may, as soon as possible, get the data the gentleman asks for and give it to the House.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GREEN of Iowa). The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I had no thought of criticism, as the gentleman from California knows. I did feel that I should like to know, and I am sure all the Members of the House would like to know, as soon as may be, approximately the estimated cost of the Army we are providing for by adding to the appropriations made the estimate of the value of supplies of various sorts that will be consumed, supplies now on hand.

Mr. KAHN. I shall put it in the RECORD as soon as I can get the figures.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to make an inquiry of the chairman of the committee. Owing to the fact I have been continuously in attendance at the hearings of the Naval Committee, which bill has just been completed and is now before the House for consideration, it may be possible that the inquiry I am about to make of the chairman has already been made and answered, and if so, I apologize for making it again. It comes to me from very high sources in the Navy Department, sources I do not question, that there seems to be an inclination on the part of the Army to prevent naval recruiting officers from going to the demobilization camps and supplying men being demobilized from the Army with literature pertaining to the Navy. They say that the recruiting officers are finding it difficult to get recruits for the Navy owing to the fact that the Army men, evidently having in mind the fact that they want all these men to go back into the Army if they are going back into any military service, prevent the naval men from interviewing these military men and giving them this literature. It has worked out in this way, that the field for recruiting recruits we urgently need now on our ships, in order that the old men may be discharged, has been curtailed and Army men deprived of a chance of going into the Navy, and I would like to ask the chairman of this committee if he has any information whether or not orders have been issued to prevent naval men from going upon the Army grounds?

Mr. KAHN. I have no information upon the subject. I do know that an effort is being made to recruit for the Army some of these men who are being discharged. I want to say my information is that the department is meeting with very poor success among the men who are just being demobilized. Of course, that would be a matter that rests entirely with the War Department. They have not informed the committee of their attitude in the matter of Navy enlistments, so I can not give the gentleman the information.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion? I understand he has the idea possibly the War Department has not that sympathy that it might have toward the making of naval enlistments.

Mr. HICKS. I have not so stated, but that is my private opinion; and I feel that, instead of two rival services of one country, there should be one service of one country.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Having that opinion and expressing it publicly, let me offer this one of the same character of my own. I noticed throughout the post offices literature gotten out by the Navy Department which said, in effect, to the young American citizen, by way of throwing a little cold water on the Army, "If you join the Navy you do not have to spend much time in training camps." How does that work out as a counter proposition to the one the gentleman advanced?

Mr. HICKS. The post offices are probably free ground for the Army and Navy or any other department of this Government. I am making the point that the Army has no right, in my opinion, to say to men in the Navy, "You shall not come upon this ground and recruit for the Navy." I believe that a man who is going out of the Army should have an equal chance to go into the Army or the Navy, whichever he sees fit.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKS. I will.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We want to get this straight. Will the gentleman state that the Navy is willing to reciprocate and permit the Army recruiting officers to board ships to get recruits?

Mr. HICKS. I will say to my friend from New York that the Navy does not demobilize on board ship.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Well, the receiving ships.

Mr. HICKS. I believe that the Navy will be perfectly willing to have men from the Army go to their demobilization camps and allow the men there to receive literature from the Army men. We will take our chances, for we should all be interested primarily in advancing Government service, irrespective of the branch.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKS. I will.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In reply to the statement just made by the chairman of the committee that they have been having very poor success in enlisting men in the Army——

Mr. KAHN. Pardon me, I did not make that statement. If the gentleman will allow me, I said they had poor success with men who are being demobilized. They are probably getting a good many men who had not been in the Army.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I want to call attention to the fact that in the statement appended to the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama on yesterday the Chief of Staff states that "enlistments reported to date, which do not include enlistments reported at camps during the present week, 48,023, so we have gotten the first block of 50,000 men called for when we started in a month or two ago."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

REGULAR SUPPLIES.

Regular supplies of the Quartermaster Corps, including their care and protection; construction and repair of military reservation fences; stoves and heating apparatus required for the use of the Army for heating offices, hospitals, barracks and quarters, and recruiting stations, and United States disciplinary barracks; also ranges, stoves, coffee roasters, and appliances for cooking and serving food at posts, in the field, and when traveling, and repair and maintenance of such heating and cooking appliances; and the necessary power for the operation of moving-picture machines; authorized issues of candles and matches; for furnishing heat and light for the authorized allowance of quarters for officers, including members of the Officers' Reserve Corps when ordered to active duty, and enlisted men, warrant officers, and field clerks, including enlisted men of the Regular Army Reserve and retired enlisted men when ordered to active duty; contract surgeons when stationed at and occupying public quarters at military posts; for officers of the National Guard attending service and garrison schools, and for recruits, guards, hospitals, storehouses, offices, the buildings erected at private cost, in the operation of the act approved May 31, 1902, and buildings for similar purposes on military reservations authorized by War Department regulations; for sale to officers and including also fuel and engine supplies required in the operation of modern batteries at established posts; for post bakeries, including bake ovens and apparatus pertaining thereto and the repair thereof; for ice machines and their maintenance where required for the health and comfort of the troops and for cold storage; ice for issue to organizations of enlisted men and offices at such places as the Secretary of War may determine, and maintenance of laundries at military posts in the United States and its island possessions; for the authorized issues of laundry materials for use of general prisoners confined at military posts without pay or allowances, and for applicants for enlistment while held under observation; authorized issues of soap; toilet paper and towels; for the necessary furniture, textbooks, paper, and equipment for the post schools and libraries, and schools for noncommissioned officers; for the purchase and issue of instruments, office furniture, stationery, and other authorized articles for the use of officers' schools at the several military posts; for purchase of relief maps for issue to organizations, commercial newspapers, market reports, etc.; for the tableware and mess furniture for kitchens and mess halls, each and all for the enlisted men, including recruits; for forage, salt, and vinegar for the horses, mules, oxen, and other draft and riding animals of the Quartermaster Corps at the several posts and stations and with the armies in the field, and for the horses of the several regiments of Cavalry and batteries of Artillery, and such companies of Infantry and Scouts as may be mounted; for remounts and for the authorized number of officers' horses, including bedding for the animals; for seeds and implements required for the raising of forage at remount depots and on military reservations in the Hawaiian and Philippine Islands, and for labor and expenses incident thereto, including, when specifically authorized by the Secretary of War, the cost of irrigation; for straw for soldiers' bedding, stationery, typewriters and exchange of same, including blank books and blank forms for the Army, certificates for discharged soldiers, and for printing department orders and reports, $95,000,000.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 24, line 5, strike out "$95,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$87,033,335."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, that amendment is in keeping with the other amendments which I offered to meet the views of the House regarding the size of the Army. The item for regular supplies can be cut to the figures I have sent to the desk.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, there was, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] stated, considerable talk about the bureau of sales of surplus supplies yesterday, and a good many of my colleagues on this side of the House seemed to be quite interested in the subject and asked me to get further particulars concerning the gentleman in charge of that bureau. I want to call the committee's attention to page 398 of the hearings, in which the director of sales of surplus supplies testified that he has had 20 years' experience with the United Gas & Improvement Co., of Philadelphia. He is a gentleman still in the prime of life, so that we can reasonably assume he has had experience as a sales manager with no other concern. And he also stated this—and I call the attention of the committee to it—on page 397 of the hearings:

During the war they gave me a leave of absence which enabled me to do a variety of things, and recently they have made the necessary arrangements to allow me to continue here if I am needed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will show you what those arrangements are. This same gentleman appeared before the Senate Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and in a hearing held pursuant to Senate resolution 386 we find this Mr. Hare, who has testified before our committee as Mr. "C. W." Hare, is Mr. "C. Willing" Hare, of Philadelphia. Mr. C. Willing Hare testified, Mr. Chairman, before that committee, and you will find part of his testimony on page 611 of the printed testimony, that he was then assistant director of munitions in the War Department, drawing a salary of $4,000 a year, and that at the same time he was receiving $15,000 a year from the United Gas & Improvement Co., of Philadelphia. When he was questioned whether this concern had any business with the Government or not, Mr. Hare said:

None whatever; and I think this can be verified by the Assistant Secretary of War or some one in his office. The only time since I have been down here, since the 1st of August, that anything came up between the Government and the United Gas & Improvement Co. was the question of supplying a certain amount of toluol, which is one of the residuums from the process of making gas, and which is used in explosives; and somebody in the Secretary's office said: "Do you know anything about this?" I said, "No; I want you to handle that thing yourself;" and how they decided that particular point has passed from my memory.

So at the same time this gentleman was drawing $15,000 a year from the United Gas & Improvement Co. he was drawing $4,000 a year from the Government, and on his testimony the Government was buying this residuum of gas from his company, but which fact he let slip from his memory.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a great deal was said yesterday whether this man was an expert or not. The gentleman from Ohio said, "Yes; he admitted himself that he was an expert." The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], the distinguished chairman of this committee, informed the committee of the enormous work of this bureau; that they had machine tools to sell, locomotives to sell——

Mr. KAHN. No; locomotive cranes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Locomotive cranes and oil, metal, and lumber. So we have this expert, whom we are paying $25,000 a year. He has been, according to his own testimony, in the employment of the United Gas & Improvement Co., of Philadelphia, for years.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I ask for additional time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent for five minutes additional. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I have heard the gentleman say a good many disagreeable things about Mr. Hare. What is his remedy? Does he want to fire him or reduce his salary?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Fire him. I trust I have made myself sufficiently clear. He was asked, on page 614 of the Senate hearings:

Your present position with it is what?

To which he replied:

Manager of the new business department which has charge of sales. Now, it has not charge of the sales of the residuals. It has charge of sales of gas and electric light to our consumers.

So this expert is an expert in selling gas and electric light. Then Senator Hardwick asked him:

In other words, you sell the main products?

Mr. HARE. We sell the main products; and in order to develop their use, of course, we have to build up the development of gas ranges, hot plates, gas irons, and anything that can use gas efficiently and will help in the domestic use of gas.

So we have this gentleman, expert in gas ranges, curling irons, and hot plates, coming here and posing as a $25,000 expert, drawing $15,000 from the United Gas & Improvement Co. for some reason which I have not yet been able to discover, and advising the various branches of the Army how to dispose of their surplus sales. I think it is an outrageous and flagrant abuse of power and a waste of public money.

The gentleman from Ohio asked what remedy I would propose. I tried to make that clear the other day. In the first place, fire this fellow. Get rid of him. One of his chief assistants upon whom he relies is a colonel in the Army and drawing a colonel's pay. There are many competent, able, trustworthy business men who entered the military service and are willing to stay and finish the job. They are in all departments, and are right in this office. My remedy would be to take the chief of the various sales departments of the Army, Ordnance, Aviation, Artillery, Quartermaster, and so on, and form an executive board of each of these chiefs of sales. They will get together. They know what they have on hand, and they will so arrange their sales as not to compete with each other or dump too much of one commodity on the market, and they will be able to carry these sales without this expensive bureau and its ornamental chiefs.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I do not know yet what the fault is that the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] is finding with the head of the sales department. He has served notice upon the committee that he intends to offer a motion to recommit this bill, with instructions to report back with a lesser amount for the running expenses of this department. I know nothing about the character or ability of Mr. Hare, and it seems that the gentleman from New York has not much more information than I have. [Applause.] I am only here to argue a principle.

As was stated yesterday——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. KEARNS. Not now; no.

As was stated, when this sales department was organized there was practically $2,000,000,000 worth of surplus products of various kinds on hand.

It seems to me as a business principle that where there is that much money involved in various kinds of products there ought to be a central department through which these sales would be made. If Mr. Hare is not the proper man for the place, the remedy lies with the Secretary of War. If the Secretary has made a bad selection he ought to remedy the mistake that he has made by removing this man and putting a competent man in charge. The only thought I have in mind is that we ought to have an expert at the head of this sales department. If Mr. Hare is not the proper man the Secretary of War can soon furnish us with a remedy. We have many different kinds of products to put upon the market. Mr. Hare told the committee that he intended to get an expert salesman, expert in the sale of each of these commodities, and put him at the head of the department selling that particular article. If he has meat for sale, he said, he would have an expert meat salesman to place that commodity on the market and obtain for the Government the very highest prices obtainable. If he had automobiles for sale he was going, he said, to get the best automobile salesman he could find in the United States and put him in charge of the sale of automobiles. If he had clothing for sale—which he has—he was going to get an expert salesman of clothing, the best obtainable in the United States, and put him in charge of that.

His theory is good, and it is the only plan that ought to be adopted by the Government. I have no defense to make of Mr. Hare. I only rose to defend the principle involved, the manner in which these goods are to be sold; and whether Mr. Hare is in charge or some other man of greater ability than he, this $1,000,000 appropriation is not too much.

As was suggested in argument yesterday, Mr. Hare, incompetent although he may be, has already recalled contracts which had been made by the Government and has sold the products at an increased price of many million dollars. For a nonexpert he has already saved the Government more money than he is now asking to carry him over the year.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEARNS. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. I want to ask the gentleman if it has come to his attention that this sales department has disposed of linters of cotton at 3 cents a pound, which the general market can not dispose of at more than 1 cent, and thereby has saved the Government more than $10,000,000 in the last two or three weeks?

Mr. KEARNS. That is only another reason why this department should be kept intact; it is only another reason why this $1,000,000 appropriation should be made; because if the gentleman's statement is correct, and I accept it as true because the gentleman stands sponsor for its truth, it has already in a single transaction ten times over paid for itself. You want an expert at the head of this department, and, as I say, if Mr. Hare is not the expert that we ought to have, certainly such a man can be found somewhere in the United States, and whatever this House may do when the motion is made to recommit the bill with that proposition to strike out this item, it ought to be voted down, and the Secretary of War, if he discovers that he has made a bad choice, undoubtedly if he has the public interest at heart—and he surely has—can right the wrong with one stroke of the pen. [Applause.]

This is not a proposition to spend $1,000,000 but is an effort to save many millions. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, following along the line of the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS], who just preceded me, I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] possibly contributed a good suggestion when he read from the Senate investigation that Mr. Hare is evidently a very important gentleman and surely demands a good salary. It is suggested in that testimony that the Philadelphia Gas Improvement Co. was paying Mr. Hare $15,000 a year and at the same time loaning him to the Government. If that be true, in all likelihood the Philadelphia Gas Improvement Co., appreciating his work and ability, and desirous of helping the Government in the great crisis we were passing through, was willing to give to the Government the services of a valuable man like Mr. Hare, and they continued to give him $15,000 a year because they were fearful that when he came to Washington to engage in Government work other industries might learn of his ability and try to take him away from them, so that they had a string tied to him by which they could retain his services.

Now, a word in regard to a great industry in the district which I have the honor to represent. When some gentlemen here desire to get some publicity or do something sensational they proceed to attack the meat-packing industry. I want to say to the Members of the House that all of the large and most of the small packing houses of Chicago are in my district. I am as anxious as any other Member of this House, if the packers do wrong, to see that they are punished, but I am also as anxious as any other Member of this House who wants to be fair to see that these industries, which have many millions of dollars of invested capital and which employ thousands of people in my district, get fair play. I do not want to see them unduly criticized, and I do not want to see them held up to the people of this country as burglars or robbers or thieves, and I think it is time that some gentlemen here stop criticism, unless it is good healthy criticism and unless they can prove what they say.

Now, I went to see Mr. Hare yesterday with reference to the sale of meat. I heard the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD] wax eloquent here about the high cost of living, and others also followed him, and I am going to ask, without burdening the Members, that this statement, which was given to me by Mr. Hare, a very concise statement concerning his attempt and the attempt of his department to distribute and to market this 141,000,000 pounds of meat which the Government has in its storehouses, be placed in the RECORD to correct the misinformation that has been given on the floor of this House by some of the Members.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by the insertion of the statement indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY. I ask that the Clerk read it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more, and, as suggested by one of my colleagues, I will read it myself.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY. I read:

STATEMENT OF THE DIRECTOR OF SALES AS TO SURPLUS OF CANNED MEATS IN THE ARMY.

JUNE 3, 1919.

The approximate surplus of canned meats held by the War Department was furnished the director of sales by the Quartermaster General of the Army about May 5, as per attached inventory. This consisted of:

	Pounds.
Bacon	47,000,000
Roast beef	38,000,000
Corned beef	36,000,000
Corned-beef hash	20,000,000
Total	141,000,000

These meats cost the Government average prices as follows:

Bacon issue, ser. 8, crates	per pound	$0.40
Bacon issue, ser. 19, 12-pound cans	do	.46
Beef, roast, 6-pound cans	per can	2.70
Beef, roast, 2-pound cans	do	.82
Beef, roast, 1-pound cans	do	.51
Beef, roast, 12-ounce cans	do	.35
Beef, corned, 6-pound cans	do	2.09
Beef, corned, 24-ounce cans	per can	$0.70
Beef, corned, 1-pound cans	do	.45
Beef, corned, 12-ounce cans	do	.38
Hash, corned beef, 2-pound cans	do	.48
Hash, corned beef, 1-pound cans	do	.28

This represents in round figures a total cost to the Government of $60,000,000.

The question of the disposal of this large quantity of canned meat was discussed, and it was decided to call in conference representatives of the packing industry who sold the meat in question to the Government; following the general policy adopted by the War Department in the disposal of all its surplus to consult with the industry affected before decision was reached as to the best method to adopt for its disposal and to endeavor to avoid dumping vast stores on the market in such a way as to entail an undue sacrifice of the Government's interests.

The following Government representatives were present at the meeting:

Gen. Kniskern, zone supply officer of Chicago district, who acted as chairman.
Col. Fred Glover, Assistant Director of Sales.
Col. Quackenbush, Assistant Director of Storage.
Capt. Foster, Chief Surplus Property Division.
Lieut. Clement, Chief of Subsistence Section, Surplus Property.
Mr. Birkenstein, Storage Division, Purchase and Storage.
Maj. Squier, Chief of Quartermaster Stores, Director of Sales Office.
Mr. Elcock, Chief of Sales Promotion, Director of Sales Office.

Representing the packers there were present the following:

Mr. J. A. Hawkinson, Wilson & Co.
Mr. M. C. Plainer, Wilson & Co.
Mr. D. B. Russell, Morris & Co.
Mr. J. J. Deady, Armour & Co.
Mr. A. F. Feiffer, Armour & Co.
Mr. W. F. Wardell, Armour & Co.
Mr. G. C. Shepherd, Cudahy & Co.
Mr. F. E. Wilbur, Cudahy & Co.
Mr. E. D. Baldwin, Libby, McNeil & Libby.
Mr. Burroughs, Swift & Co.

The general question was discussed as to how this canned meat could be marketed in this country to the best advantage. The department had no organization to retail this large supply to individual consumers, and the packers' opinion was therefore asked as to what was the best method to dispose of it.

In substance they stated that the canned meats were not in commercial packages and that the canned roast beef had never been sold to the consuming public in this country, its use having been heretofore incident to the supply of various mining expeditions and logging camps, etc. Furthermore, the shape in which it was packed made it necessary to repack it before it could even be offered for sale and any reasonable price realized. It was further brought out that this canned roast beef was not even used for the Army in peace times, fresh beef being the ration.

It was stated that there is a market for corned beef in 12 and 24 ounce cans, but it was believed that the Government could secure no more for the 2-pound cans, containing almost 33 per cent more corned beef, if sold generally to the consuming public than they could for the commercial size 12 and 24 ounce cans, and that therefore, before making any attempt to sell this to the consuming public in this country, it should be repacked in commercial sizes.

The market for corned-beef hash, it was stated, is limited, most of it being sold in 6-ounce cans on individual order, and in order to market this to the public to the best advantage to the Government it would be necessary to repack it in commercial-size cans.

The bacon was specially cured for the Army. It contains an unusual amount of salt and has gone through a process of eight days' smoking instead of the usual 48 hours for the bacon prepared for the trade. The majority of this bacon is put up in sealed cans for export to the troops overseas.

In regard to the 8,000,000 pounds of bacon crated and located in Chicago, Baltimore, and Columbus, it was brought out that sealed proposals were about to be asked for in connection with a supply of approximately 2,400,000 pounds at Baltimore. This quantity had been offered the meat packers and meat dealers and the meat trade in general located east of the Mississippi.

In view of these various statements, and further in view of the fact that it had come to the attention of the director of sales office that Mr. Hoover had very recently purchased in this country for shipment overseas bacon held by the Italian and French Governments in this country, it was decided advisable to get in touch with Mr. Hoover and ascertain whether or not he would not purchase a certain amount of the canned surplus meats held by the Army.

If it was found that the canned meats could not be sold to advantage overseas, the packers were willing to cooperate in any way possible to help in the disposal of it in this country, and it was suggested that if it was decided to use the packers' distribution facilities, that they would be willing to act as the Government's selling agents and sell the canned meats at prices dictated by the Government and charge the actual expenses involved.

It was explained at this meeting that this amount of canned meat was produced by the packers in about five months, running at full capacity, three shifts per day, and represented as much canned meat as would ordinarily be packed in two and one-half years. Therefore, if an effort were made to dump this entire supply on the American market, irrespective of the prices secured for it, it would probably lead to a disruption of the entire canning industry for a period of a year.

Immediately after this meeting a cable was sent to Mr. Hoover through the United States Liquidation Commission asking him whether or not he was in the market to purchase a portion of the canned meats held by the Government. Mr. Hoover's representative in this country, Mr. J. S. Barnes, was also consulted; but Mr. Barnes did not believe that he was in the market to purchase them.

The question of the disposal of these canned meats in this country was discussed with the Salvation Army; Red Cross; the Farmers' Union, who distribute food products through cooperative stores; the Central Purchasing Committee of New York City, which does the purchasing for all charitable, penal, and hospital institutions in the city of New York; Austin Nichols & Co., of Brooklyn; and R. C. Williams & Co., of New York City, two of the largest wholesale grocery houses in the country.

Col. Parker, representing the Salvation Army, stated that they might be able to buy a limited amount of the canned meats, provided a satisfactory price were named as they are obliged to sell at very low prices.

The Red Cross have no distributing means.

The Farmers' Union stated that they did not care to purchase any of it, and advised strongly that it be sold for export.

The central purchasing committee of New York City stated that they purchased only fresh meat, and unless a considerable change were made in their dietary regulations they would not be able to purchase it.

Austin Nichols and R. C. Williams & Co. stated that they would be interested in a small quantity at a price for export.

The matter was also taken up with A. R. Rodway Co., exporters of canned-food products in New York City, and Nogan Garrison & Co., merchants' representatives of groceries and canned meats of New York City, who stated that they would be interested in small amounts for export solely, and that no market, in their opinion, existed for this type of canned meat in this country.

Since the meeting with the packers bids have been received for the 2,400,000 pounds of bacon held at Baltimore. This bacon cost the Government approximately 40 cents a pound. Several thousand circular letters were sent out requesting bids and only 12 bids were received. The highest bid for all this bacon was 21 cents per pound. None of the bids were accepted, and negotiations are now under way, and it is believed that a sale of all of this bacon can be made for approximately 28 cents per pound to a commission house in Baltimore, who represent Texas interests and will resell this bacon to be used for the colored trade in the South.

We are now circularizing approximately 20,000 State, municipal, and charitable institutions, asking them to bid on this surplus meat, and we may be able to dispose of a certain amount of it in this way. We are also circularizing all of the dealers, wholesale and retail grocers, and other dealers in food products who may be interested, and this sale is being advertised in all daily papers in cities where the meat is stored and in trade papers appealing to produce men, wholesale grocers, hotel men, and large dealers in foodstuffs.

We are also seeing if arrangements can not be made through which some of this canned meat may be offered direct to the public at the warehouses where it is stored in Chicago, Columbus, Schenectady, New Cumberland, Pa., Newport News, Baltimore, Omaha, New Orleans, Boston, San Antonio, New York, St. Louis, El Paso, Atlanta, and San Francisco. On account of the inaccessibility of the warehouses where this food is stored, however, it is doubtful whether any considerable portion of the public will come to a sale if carried out.

Before any of these sales, however, can take place the important question must be decided as to what price we are to market this vast store of foodstuff for. It is obvious that if the price is made low enough and the articles sacrificed that all of it can be disposed of in this country. It must not be forgotten, however, that a very much better price can be secured through export.

We already have offers from various firms averaging approximately 70 per cent of the cost price to the Government, and an inquiry arrived on the 28th from the American Oceanic Corporation stating that they were authorized to purchase foodstuffs in amounts up to $10,000,000 for shipment to Roumania, payment to be made by two-year Roumanian treasury notes at par, bearing 6 per cent interest, payable in gold dollars.

It must be remembered that all of this canned meat is considered perishable; i. e., that under the storage conditions maintained by the Army it is doubtful if it will remain marketable for a longer period than nine months. I also want to draw your attention to the fact that once a can is opened it spoils very rapidly, which would make it rather difficult for the average small household to make use of the larger-sized cans which the Army has for disposal.

It seems advisable therefore that we continue our present effort to market as much of this surplus as possible in this country at the best prices obtainable and sell the remainder for export. It must be borne in mind, however, that if a low price is established here for domestic sales it will make it more difficult to secure a higher price for the same class of canned meats from exporters.

Some of this information has already been placed in the RECORD, having been inserted at the instance of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD] the other day.

Some gentlemen criticize the propriety of calling in representatives of the packing industry. If you have 141,000,000 pounds of meat to be disposed of, who should know more about meat products than the packers, and who could give more expert advice? When the war broke out the packing industries of Chicago came to Washington and offered to turn over their plants to the Government. They were willing and anxious to do everything they possibly could do to help this country win the war. There is no industry in the world that has been more responsive to the wants of Uncle Sam than the great packing industries of Chicago. On 24 hours they delivered millions upon millions of pounds of meat to the seacoasts to be sent over to our boys. They never fell down in one of their orders. They delivered the best meats. There was no quibbling about prices, no question of prices. They wanted to do everything they could consistently do—everything within their power. They came down here at the invitation of Mr. Hare, as I understand, and said to him, "These meats that you people have purchased from us were specially prepared for overseas, have been put up in large cans, for which there is little demand. We have no call for them from the grocers or the butchers, and therefore we can not conveniently take them back, but we will do everything we can to help you market them. We will give you the use of our sales department, we will assist and help in every way, but we think it would be more advantageous to the Government to export this meat, in order that the Government may get its price, because it was particularly prepared for export."

Now, I hold no brief for the packers. I am just casually acquainted with some of them; but I serve notice that from now on I am going to fight for my district here whenever it is attacked. I am going to manifest just as much interest in my district as some of you other gentlemen have shown. I think it was the former Speaker of the House who said, "You've got to quit akickin' my dog around," and I am serving notice on some champions of various districts that they had better let my district alone, or, at least, when they criticize it they be fair and honest. All I ask for my district is that you treat the people there as fairly as you treat the poor farmer. If you do that, we will have no complaint, and we will be sure to get everything we want, and maybe a little bit more. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. FESS. Has the gentleman the figures as to the amount of meat in cold storage, not held by the War Department, but in the country.

Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY. I regret to say that I have not. I visited Mr. Hare because of the attack upon this particular industry, and he kindly gave me this synopsis that he had prepared.

Mr. FESS. I am sure that the gentleman is just as much interested as the rest of us are in knowing the reasons why prices are so high when there is so much being held on hand. I have from the Bureau of Markets the figures as to the amount of meat held in cold storage, and those figures are startling, in view of the price of meat.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY. May I have time enough to read the rest of this into the RECORD?

Mr. KAHN. The figures are already in the RECORD, and I suggest to the gentleman that he had better put the entire correspondence in.

Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY. I will be very glad to do that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. I ask unanimous consent that I may read a few figures which I have as to the amount of meat in cold storage as reported by the Bureau of Markets in its last report. It will not take over two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. The amount of frozen beef in cold storage is 167,000,000 pounds plus; cured beef, 27,000,000 pounds; frozen lamb and mutton, 7,000,000 pounds; frozen pork, 138,000,000 pounds; dry salt pork, 413,000,000 pounds; pickled pork, 427,000,000 pounds; lard, 107,000,000 pounds; miscellaneous, 113,000,000 pounds; total, 1,399,000,000 pounds of meat in cold storage to-day.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question.

Mr. FESS. Just a moment and then I will yield. At the time of the last report of the Bureau of Markets there was on hand in the way of poultry, broilers, 10,000,000 pounds plus, as against 3,000,000 pounds a year ago, being 346 per cent more now in peace times than a year ago in war times; roasting chickens, 18,000,000 pounds, as against 7,000,000 pounds a year ago, an increase of 165 per cent; ordinary fowls, 18,000,000 pounds, as against 4,000,000 pounds a year ago, an increase of 450 per cent, making a total of 46,000,000 pounds of cold-storage fowls, speaking only of chickens, as against 14,000,000 pounds a year ago. And my observation is that the price of meat and fowls is higher now than ever before. It seems to me there ought to be some way to get at this problem of high price with such supply on hand, and if there is no way that the War Department or the other departments in charge can get at it, I think a persuasive resolution from this House would help a little. I am convinced that this body should at least take steps to get at the situation. [Applause.]

Mr. DOWELL. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I rise to make an inquiry of the committee and to read a few lines from the testimony of Mr. Hare in the hearings on this bill. On page 399 of the hearings I read as follows:

> The general way in which sales are made is either by negotiation or by sealed bids. In certain cases where it has been found possible, or in the case of every class of material where it has been found possible, we have called into the meeting representatives of the industry which created this particular material. The Government's policy has been to get the material back through the ordinary channels of trade, to get the very best price we could, and at the same time not create an unnecessary disturbance in the labor and business conditions of the country.

May I inquire if it is the purpose of this department to sell these materials on the market or to turn them back to the persons from whom they were purchased? Does the interpretation of the language I have just read mean that these materials are not to be placed in the hands of the public and are not to go into the hands of the consumers, but they are to go back from whence they came? In other words, is it the purpose of this department to turn back the meats and foodstuffs now in the hands of the War Department to the packers and thus prevent these meats from going upon the market and getting into the hands of the consumers, except through that source?

I would be pleased to know what interpretation the committee places upon this language. The House ought to have this information now.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take up the time of the committee at any great length. On page 469 of the hearings there is some testimony about it, which I will not attempt to read. As I recall, the gentleman, Mr. Hare, when testifying before the committee, stated specifically that he was endeavoring to sell these meat products to the various penal institutions of the country, to the various eleemosynary institutions of the country, to the large lumber camps and construction camps of the country, so it does not seem that they intend to turn them back altogether to the packers.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. KAHN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLACK. I thought the gentleman had yielded the floor. I only want three minutes.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph be concluded in three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that all debate on the paragraph be concluded in three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, there has been so much said in criticism of the policy of the War Department in the sale of the canned meats and other surplus meats which it has on hand that I think it is but fair at this particular time to read from the statement of Mr. Hare upon that particular point as found on page 467 of the hearings. I think any of us will at once say that the suspicions of the gentleman from Iowa, or his misunderstanding of the situation, as the case might be, are not well founded. It will be remembered that Mr. Hare is the director of sales of the War Department, and it has been stated by those who ought to know that he is a very capable business man of irreproachable standing.

On page 467, in the statement of Mr. Hare, this explanation of the efforts he is using to dispose of these meats appears:

> The question of the disposal of these canned meats in this country was discussed with the Salvation Army; Red Cross; the Farmers' Union, who distribute food products through cooperative stores; the central purchasing committee of New York City, which does the purchasing for all charitable, penal, and hospital institutions in the city of New York; Austin Nichols & Co., of Brooklyn, and R. C. Williams & Co., of New York City, two of the largest wholesale grocery houses in the country.
> Col. Parker, representing the Salvation Army, stated that they might be able to buy a limited amount of the canned meats, provided a satisfactory price were named, as they are obliged to sell at very low prices.
> The Red Cross have no distributing means.
> The Farmers' Union stated that they did not care to purchase any of it and advised strongly that it be sold for export.
> Since the meeting with the packers bids have been received for the 2,400,000 pounds of bacon held at Baltimore. This bacon cost the Government approximately 40 cents a pound. Several thousand circular letters were sent out requesting bids and only 12 bids were received. The highest bid for all of this bacon was 21 cents per pound. None of the bids were accepted and negotiations are now under way, and it is believed that a sale of all of this bacon can be made for approximately 28 cents per pound to a commission house in Baltimore, who represent Texas interests, and will resell this bacon to be used for the colored trade in the South.

I could go on and read further from the hearings showing the diligent efforts that are being made to make proper sale of these products, but I will not undertake to do so at this time; but I will say that if gentlemen will read the hearings instead of taking up the time in criticizing the War Department they will find that the War Department is using every possible effort to wisely and economically market these products with good, sane business judgment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

INCIDENTAL EXPENSES.

Postage; cost of telegrams on official business received and sent by officers of the Army, including members of the Officers' Reserve Corps, when ordered to active duty; extra pay to soldiers employed on extra duty, under the direction of the Quartermaster Corps, in the erection of barracks, quarters, and storehouses, in the construction of roads, and other constant labor for periods of not less than 10 days; as additional school-teachers during the school term at post schools, and as clerks for post quartermasters at military posts, and for overseers of general prisoners at posts designated by the War Department for the confinement of general prisoners, and for the United States disciplinary barracks guard; of extra-duty pay at rates to be fixed by the Secretary of War for mess stewards and cooks at recruit depots who are graduates of the schools for bakers and cooks, and instructor cooks at the schools for bakers and cooks; for expenses of expresses to and from frontier posts and armies in the field; of escorts to officers or agents of the Quartermaster Corps to trains where military escorts can not be furnished; hire of laborers in the Quartermaster Corps, including the care of officers' mounts when the same are furnished by the Government, and the hire of interpreters, spies, or guides for the Army; compensation of clerks and other employees of the Quartermaster Corps, and clerks, foremen, watchmen, and organist for the United States disciplinary barracks, and incidental expenses of recruiting; for the apprehension, securing, and delivering of deserters, including escaped military prisoners, and the expenses incident to their pursuit, and no greater sum than $50 for each deserter or escaped military prisoner shall, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, be paid to any civil officer or citizen for such services and expenses; for a donation of $5 to each dishonorably discharged prisoner upon his release from confinement under court-martial sentence, involving dishonorable discharge; and such additional expenditures as are necessary and authorized by law in the movements and operation of the Army, and at military posts, and not expressly assigned to any other department, $20,000,000.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. EMERSON: Page 25, insert: "There shall be paid to each honorably discharged soldier who served over 30 days in the World War the sum of $300 in addition to any bonus now paid."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. EMERSON. Will not the gentleman reserve the point of order?

Mr. KAHN. No; I want to finish this bill by 6 o'clock tonight.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman give me one minute?

Mr. KAHN. If the gentleman asks unanimous consent for one minute, I do not object.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting what other countries are paying discharged soldiers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. EMERSON. I think we all realize that we have not paid enough to our discharged soldiers, sailors, or marines.

I have offered this amendment to this bill for the soldiers, and will offer a like amendment to the naval bill for the marines and sailors.

Considering the purchasing power of money we are paying less than any other country in the world. Sixty dollars does not even clothe the discharged soldier, and if he happens not to have other means and has no job to which he can go he immediately becomes an object of charity. A majority of the discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines prefer the money bonus. If they were asked which they preferred, land or money, 98 per cent would say money.

I submit the following facts on this subject:

DENVER, COLO., June 6, 1919.

To the Members of Congress:

Playfair takes the stand that the soldier and the sailor are entitled to full pay for the time they have given their country on a basis somewhere approximating the commercial value of that time. The soldiers and sailors have given approximately forty million months. They are coming home flat in pocketbook. They can not afford to make that huge sacrifice. Nor can we, the 100,000,000 who remained at home and enjoyed war profits, ask them to donate to us something like three and one-half million years of their time. Playfair has proposed that an equitable settlement could be reached by paying each soldier and sailor $50 for each month that he has served. And a further proposal was made that this payment could take the form of a soldiers and sailors victory bond issue, the bonds not being offered to the public for sale, but being given to the soldiers and sailors at the rate of a $50 bond for each month served.

It would be required that each soldier and sailor accepting such payment give the Government a signed release disavowing any future service pension claim.

This plan has many advantages over any flat bonus such as a year's pay for each man regardless of the length of time served. The man who has served 20 months under any bonus plan would be treated the same as the man who has served 5 or 10 months. The amount of time that a man has given his country is the vital element. No compensation scheme that is not strictly based upon the length of service with full pay for the time served can be satisfactory. Besides, no other plan would entitle the Government to demand a signed release disclaiming future service pension.

Unless the soldiers and sailors receive equitable compensation for the time they have rendered now service pensions will surely come up in the future. It will cost $2,000,000,000 at the present time to liquidate our debt on this score. If we give a bonus, large or small, and disregard the question of future pensions very little good will have been done. If we pay in full for the boys' time now, not as a bonus but as compensation due based strictly on the number of months served, we will save many billions in pensions later, besides putting a smile on the faces of millions of the boys who need and can use the money due them right now.

Yours, truly,

PLAYFAIR,
URBAN A. WALTER, Editor.

Soldiers who have completed more than 12 calendar months' war service will receive, in addition, the following sums in respect of each complete calendar month or portion of a calendar month of war service beyond 12 months, subject to a maximum addition of 48 such monthly increments, corresponding to a total gratuity covering five years' war service:

(a) If with any war service overseas, 10s. ($2.40).

(b) If with no such service, 5s. ($1.20).

The rates under both (a) and (b) being subject to reduction in the cases shown in the next paragraph, and the rate under (b) not applying to any war service rendered by the soldier as a boy.

7. If a soldier has been entitled to draw service pension during any portion of his war service, or if he has been entitled under article 6 of the Royal warrant published in army order 1 of 1918, to elect to draw it, in respect of any portion of that service, irrespective of whether he has actually drawn it or not, the monthly addition for any month during the whole of which pension has been or would have been issuable, will be 5s. 8. The minimum gratuity payable to a soldier who is a boy will be £2 ($9.60). The additional sum for each month's war service after the first 12 months will be as in paragraph 6, except that if no service has been rendered overseas the sum shall be 2s. 6d. 9. The soldier who has served both as boy and man will be eligible for the minimum as a man if he has given any war service overseas, or has over six months' war service as a man. Otherwise the boy's minimum will apply.

The monthly additions will be 10s. ($2.40) if any overseas war service has been rendered; if not, they will be 2s. 6d. (60 cents) for each month (beyond the first 12) served wholly as a boy, and 5s. ($1.20 for each subsequent month.

DEMOBILIZATION IN GREAT BRITAIN.

OFFICIAL STATEMENTS IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS FROM THE SIGNING OF THE ARMISTICE TO THE PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT NOVEMBER 21, 1918.

[Compiled from the parliamentary debates in the Legislative Reference Division, Library of Congress.]

INFORMATION FOR THE ARMY. NOVEMBER 12.

Mr. MACPHERSON (undersecretary of state for war). I am fully aware of the importance of the diffusion amongst the troops serving abroad of information as to the Government plans for the demobilization of the forces. Arrangements have been made by which full information concerning the method of demobilization will be given to the troops when the situation is suitable. Lectures are already being given at the front dealing with the outlines of the procedure to be adopted.

MARRIED MEN (RELEASE). NOVEMBER 12.

Mr. MACPHERSON. The claims of married men to early release have been recognized, and it has been provided in the scheme of demobilization that, other conditions being equal, married men shall be selected in preference to single men for the drafts for disposal.

COAL SUPPLY (RELEASE OF MINERS). NOVEMBER 12.

Mr. MACPHERSON. In view of the present situation, as many additional miners as possible who are serving at home will be released, and I understand some are being released from France.

LEAVE WITH PAY AND UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFITS. NOVEMBER 12.

Dr. MACNAMARA (secretary to the admiralty). It may be as well that I should state at once that on demobilization each man will receive at least 28 days' leave with pay and allowances, and that he will be fully insured against unemployment for a period of not less than 20 weeks during the first year.

UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFITS. NOVEMBER 12.

Dr. ADDISON (minister of reconstruction). The rates for benefits for both exservice and civil workers are as follows: Adults, 24s. per week for men and 20s. per week for women, with 6s. per week for the first dependent child under 15 and 3c. per week for each succeeding dependent child, so that a man with a wife and one child will get 30s. per week and 3s. for each additional dependent child. The donation will not be payable for the first three days of any continuous period of unemployment. The out-of-work donation payable to partially disabled men in receipt of pensions will be additional to their pensions, and no deductions will be made on account of such pensions.

PLAN OF DEMOBILIZATION. NOVEMBER 12.

Dr. ADDISON. I propose to issue a pamphlet, which is in popular form, but I hope honorable members will not like it any the less for that. It is intended to be read by the general public. It will be posted to every member this evening. The pamphlet sets out the whole scheme of army demobilization, and it is reduced at the end to the form of question and answer. It deals with the navy, the air force, and the army. This matter was gone into at great length by a committee presided over by my honorable friend, the secretary of state for India [Mr. Montagu], appointed by the previous Government, and we have adopted the principle that demobilization must be governed by industrial requirements. It has been a most elaborate piece of work. We have had to have the army classified into trade groups, of which there are 42, and the department at the war office that deals with this side of the question fills me with admiration. Arrangements have been made to mark down, first, what we call the demobilizers. They are the people required to start the demobilizing machinery. That has been done. The next group are what we call pivotal men; and here, again, I have issued a precise statement. You get in practically every work some men around whom the work revolves, and until they are there you can not get the work started. Therefore, the ministry of labor have invited the different trades to specify their pivotal groups, and these are separately catalogued in the army.

The demobilization, whilst the man is with the colors, will be managed with the war office, but the order or priority of demobilization—the arrangement for picking out the pivotal men—is undertaken by the organization at the ministry of labor under Sir Stephenson Kent. The civil side is under that organization, and the army deals with the military side of it. Those are the two organizations which work in common and which deal with the whole arrangements.

In discussing occupation we naturally have to have regard to those occupations the reestablishment of which causes the biggest amount of employment. We naturally put them very high in the scale. Therefore the priority grading of employment is based upon considerations of that kind. It must depend partly upon the time of the year, because grading is different now from what it would be in harvst time. At any rate, these pivotal men represent a group, and they, of course will come back early. But within each group we have regard to the length of service the men have done during the war, whether a man is married, and other considerations of that kind. Another large group of the army which has been separately marked down, and which makes our problem very much easier, is that large group of men for whom there are jobs waiting for them when they come back. I am sure we all recognize that it is a national duty to secure these men the priority of reemployment when they return. I am glad to say, according to information I have received from the minister of labor, that more than 60 per cent of the men in the army are what are called "slip" men; that is to say, men who have jobs awaiting them. So that when a commanding officer receives an order to send back a certain number of men he knows at once which men are the pivotal men and which men have a job awaiting them, and this eases our problem enormously with regard to employment at home. Those have been the governing considerations right through this very elaborate scheme.

The scheme deals with the whole of the Army, whether at home or abroad. The committee considered very carefully the rate of demobilization. That necessarily must depend upon all kinds of military considerations, some of which are obvious, and the maximum rate of demobilization can clearly only be attained after some time, but the general scheme contemplates that the rate of demobilization from the forces at home will be the same compared with the rate of demobilization of the forces overseas. That at first might look as if it gave some advantage to the men at home, but, as a matter of fact, the men at home in the vast majority of cases have seen foreign service; they have been abroad; therefore you can not distinguish in that way, and the scheme contemplates an equal demobilization of the two groups. The machinery by which they are to be demobilized is set out in detail in the pamphlet which I am circulating to honorable Members, therefore I need not trouble the committee with it now. I may say that a man is sent primarily to a place that is called his dispersal station, which is near his home. There he receives a protection certificate, a railway warrant home, a cash payment of his war gratuity, and an out-of-work donation policy, which lasts, in the case of the soldiers, 12 months and covers 26 weeks of unemployment, with benefit at the rate I have mentioned. He will receive the war gratuity. The precise method of the payment of that will be announced shortly. I believe it is likely that it will be paid in four weekly installments. The man will receive 28 days' furlough when he reaches his dispersal station and will then receive pay and ration allowance during that time, and the separation allowance will also continue during that period.

There is another class of demobilized men, before I come to the officers, for whom we have to make special provision. A large number of men joined the Army who had not completed their apprenticeship. It will be, I am sure, a waste of brains and energy if these men, after three or four years' service, have to go back to civil life and find that they have lost their skill. They were practically unskilled workmen, and we must provide some incentive to their completing a short term of apprenticeship which will bring them up to a sufficient standard of skill. Therefore we have worked out this scheme for a system of completion of apprenticeship for men who have been serving in the forces. Again I will circulate the full details, as it is a rather elaborate scheme. It is a rather elaborate scheme, but what it comes to is this—we discussed it with the employers and the workmen's representatives in great detail—the employer is to pay wages to the apprentice during the first 12 months representing not less than seven-twelfths of the current rate of wages, and the State makes them up to the man, so that he gets in the aggregate three-fourths of the wages to which he would have been entitled at that stage of his apprenticeship, and the next year it makes up to a bigger fraction still, namely, five-sixths. That is to say, what we really do, on the basis of the employer affording facilities for an intensive form of apprenticeship, is to make a contribution, in view of the man's age being greater than it otherwise would have been, in order to bring up his wages practically to the standard of what they would have been at that stage of his career. The details are elaborate; therefore I do not give the committee anything but a bare statement.

Now I come to the question of officers. We have dealt with great care with the question of officers, and the committee, under Sir Reginald Brade, spent a great many months working on this business. I am sure the committee will recognize that in respect to a large number of young men of all branches of training who gave up their prospects, who have been in the Army and have become dislocated from their normal employment, we are under a very special heavy responsibility. The Government has accepted the general principle that from the beginning of demobilization and for a year afterwards permanent appointments in the civil service shall be reserved for ex-officers and ex-soldiers. As the rigid application of this rule, however, would exclude certain candidates with special qualification, it is intended that the rule should not apply (a) to the relatively small number of posts requiring special technical qualifications or involving special responsibility, and (b) that it should not apply to a limited number of cases in which men pronounced unfit on grounds of health for general service have been temporarily employed and are specially recommended by the heads of their departments. With those exceptions, by that means we open the civil service to ex-officers and ex-soldiers for 12 months after the war.

The next thing is that a great number of officers and men in various callings have had their professional training interrupted during the war, and it would be equally, as in the case of the skilled mechanic and the apprentice, very unfortunate if we were not to recognize that we have special responsibility with regard to enabling these men to complete their professional or other training. Therefore it is recognized that the further training or education of young ex-officers in various callings, or men not officers, who have interrupted their training in those callings, is a matter in which we have special responsibility, and the war cabinet has agreed to the principles of a scheme whereby, where circumstances require, assistance with respect to fees and maintenance shall be given on the recommendation of the training committee to enable men in those classes to complete their training. The details of the scheme proposed will be announced very shortly.

With regard particularly to a special class of cases in which the one-man business figures very largely, we propose to make provision against that by continuing the civil liabilities department after the termination of the war, so that assistance subsequent to demobilization may be given in accordance with a scheme based upon the existing regulations of the department. That covers assistance with regard to officers and men who are unable, by reason of their undertaking military service, to meet their financial obligations after demobilization and are thereby exposed to serious hardship, and the obligations in respect of which assistance may be granted are those arising in respect of rent, interest, and installments payable in respect of loans, including mortgages, installments payable under agreements for the purchase of business premises, a dwelling house, furniture, and the like, rates and taxes, insurance premiums, and school fees. We will continue the existing scheme for assisting those cases. There it will be within the discretion of the department which deals with the civil liabilities to make a grant, either in the form of a lump sum or by quarterly or other installments; and if in any particular case the department is of opinion that in lieu of assistance in respect of any of the specific obligations mentioned above it is desirable that assistance should be given for the purpose of enabling applicants to purchase stock, trade, or shop fittings, a grant may be given for this purpose.

In connection with reorganization we have to consider another question which has been present to the mind of everyone, and that is the considerable and very right demand that in appropriate cases, where they are capable of making good use of these facilities, the men shall have some right of access to the land. A scheme has been worked out and examined in great detail by a cabinet committee, the details of which will be announced shortly, which will provide facilities for ex-service men of all branches of service for settlement, either on small holdings, allotments, or gardens.

CIVIL POSITIONS (PRIORITY OF RELEASE). NOVEMBER 13.

Mr. MACPHERSON. Provision has been made in the demobilization scheme that those men whose civil positions have been kept open for them shall receive priority of release within their several industrial groups. Instructions will be issued in due course, but no application should be made by employers until public notification is given. While it is not proposed to differentiate between volunteers and conscripts as such, the object aimed at will be achieved by including in early drafts a certain proportion of those men who have served longest in a theater of active operations.

INFORMATION FROM EMPLOYERS. NOVEMBER 13.

Mr. ROBERTS (minister of labor). In order to assist the working of the schemes by which men with definite employment awaiting them can be released early, action in the direction indicated by the honorable and gallant member is being taken. Letters are being issued to employers suggesting that they should prepare particulars of men now with the forces whom they wish to engage immediately upon dispersal. The particulars required will be the men's names, the nature of the employment, and the rate of wages offered, and also, if possible, the unit, regimental number, and home address. It is not desired that these particulars should be supplied to the ministry of labor at present, but employers will be asked in due course to send the particulars to the employment exchanges on special cards which will be supplied.

APPLICATIONS FOR RELEASE. NOVEMBER 14.

Mr. ROBERTS. The civil demobilization and resettlement department of the ministry of labor will be responsible for dealing with applications for the release of men from the forces and for laying down the principles which, subject to the exigencies of the naval and military situation, will regulate the order of release. I promise to deal with both these points in a public announcement.

POLICE. NOVEMBER 14.

Mr. MACPHERSON. Provision has been made in the demobilization scheme for the early release of policemen serving with His Majesty's forces.

PROCEDURE. NOVEMBER 18.

Mr. MACPHERSON. Men will be released from military service in accordance with a general scheme of industrial priority which is being prepared by the ministry of labor. When demobilization begins, dispersal drafts will be formed by officers commanding units strictly in accordance with instructions which have been laid down, wherein the principle of a priority on industrial grounds is combined with that of a limited priority on other grounds, such as marital condition, length of war service, etc.

MEMENTO OF SERVICE. NOVEMBER 19.

Mr. MACPHERSON. It is intended that on demobilization a soldier will retain his uniform (except greatcoat) and kit, and he will therefore keep his cap and badge.

AGRICULTURAL LABOR. NOVEMBER 19.

Mr. MACPHERSON. There are at present over 79,000 men in agricultural companies, and 5,000 plowmen, who are in medical category A, have just been sent out on two months' furlough. All men at home of any medical category who are thrashers are now being obtained from the army. During the harvest 20,000 soldiers were supplied, of whom about 3,000 are still engaged on potato lifting. Any men of low medical category who are experienced farm workers, and are serving at home, are being attached to agricultural companies and made available for agricultural work.

PROFESSIONAL MEN. NOVEMBER 19.

Dr. ADDISON. Arrangements have been made to earmark for early release when general demobilization begins soldiers who have definite offers of employment. The honorable member will appreciate the need for demobilizing first of all those men whose services are essential for the reestablishment of industries which will be able to absorb labor. In regulating the priority of release due weight will be given to the industrial importance of surveyors and valuers.

YOUNG SOLDIERS (EDUCATION). NOVEMBER 20.

Mr. MACPHERSON. It has been arranged that officers and men whose education has been interrupted by military service, and who wish to resume their studies, will be treated on the same basis as those men who have definite employment awaiting them, and they will be granted early release within the period of general dispersal. I am unable to make any statement as to when this release will take effect. * * * What I have tried to arrange is this: There are a great many brilliant young boys in officers' cadet battalions, and I am now most anxious that they should be allowed to attend their examinations at Oxford or Cambridge.

BUILDING TRADES. NOVEMBER 20.

Mr. MACPHERSON. The urgent necessities of the building trades will not be lost sight of in the administration of the scheme of demobilization.

BUSINESS PROPRIETORS. NOVEMBER 20.

Mr. MACPHERSON. The general scheme of demobilization provides that proprietors of one-man businesses who will be able to recommence their business may be released from the Army on the same basis as other men with employment awaiting them.

PIVOTAL MEN. NOVEMBER 21.

Mr. BRIDGEMAN (parliamentary secretary to the ministry of labor). Employers who wish to insure that men serving with the forces who desire to return to their employment are earmarked for early release should obtain from the nearest employment exchange a post card (E. D. 406), enter on it each man's full name, unit, regimental number, and the theater of war or command where he is now serving, and return it to the exchange. These forms (E. D. 406) are also obtainable from employment exchanges throughout Scotland.

FRANCE—BONUS ON DEMOBILIZATION TO SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

Sections 1–7 of the act of March 22, 1919, providing for a demobilization bonus. (Journal officiel, Mar. 29, 1919, p. 3218.)

SEC. 1. Any soldier or sailor now serving or having served, up to and including the grade of captain, being a French citizen, whether called to or retained in active service as a result of the present war or voluntarily enlisted, shall receive a fixed bonus of 250 francs ($48.25), payable on the day of his discharge from active service or immediately upon promulgation of this act if he has already been discharged: Provided, however, That he has completed three months of effective service between August 2, 1914, and the date of the signature of the peace treaty.

Men pensioned or discharged for disabilities incurred while with the colors shall be entitled to this bonus irrespective of the length of their effective service.

SEC. 2. There shall be paid, in addition to this bonus, a premium of 15 francs ($2.90) for each month of effective service between August 2, 1914, and the day of the discharge, over and above the period of service required by law in the case of the class to which the interested party belongs.

This premium shall be increased to 20 francs ($3.86) for each month in active duty between August 2, 1914, and November 11, 1918, with a large unit (army corps, division) or a fighting unit under command of generals commanding in chief. For the period subsequent to November 11, 1918, the rate of 20 francs shall be paid only for the months during which the fighting indemnity may have been due.

The following shall be reckoned as effective service: The time spent in hospitals, sick leaves on account of wounds or illness, the time elapsed while awaiting discharge for disability (instance de réforme), the time spent in captivity, and, in general, all the months during which a mobilized soldier or sailor was drawing his pay or would have been entitled to do so under the regulations now in force: Provided, however, That in the case of mobilized soldiers or sailors called to the colors ahead of the date for the regular call of their class, the monthly premium for the time served ahead of such date shall be 20 francs ($3.86).

SEC. 3. No mobilized soldiers or sailors of any class shall be entitled to the monthly premiums for such time as they have been receiving both their military pay and the total or partial amount of a pension or salary, when the aggregate amount of the salary or pension and of the military pay shall have exceeded 5,000 francs ($965) per annum, with an allowance of 1,000 francs ($193) per child under 16 years of age.

SEC. 4. Mobilized soldiers and sailors working in factories, those to whom a delay for joining the colors has been granted, and those detached without pay, entitled to the fixed bonus provided for by section 1, who may receive or have already received a discharge indemnity (indemnité de congédiement), shall not be allowed to draw both such indemnity and the fixed bonus of 250 francs ($48.25): Provided, however, That they may do so up to the amount of said bonus. They shall not be entitled to the monthly premiums unless they have completed at least 18 months of effective service, as defined in section 2. The amount of the monthly premiums shall always be deducted up to the amount of the discharge indemnity in excess of 250 francs ($48.25).

SEC. 5. The said premium shall be paid by monthly installments of 100 francs ($19.30), the first payment to be made one month after that of the fixed bonus of 250 francs: Provided, however, That if the payee accepts payment in one-year national defense bonds the full amount may be paid him immediately.

SEC. 6. Any mobilized soldier or sailor may renounce the fixed bonus and the monthly premiums by giving notice thereof to the mayor of the commune, who shall publicly record the same and shall notify the depot of the interested party of such renunciation.

The party shall be permitted in this case to assign one-third of the amount to which he was entitled to works of charity approved by the Government or by the department.

SEC. 7. The amount of and the rules applicable to the payment of a fixed bonus and of a premium proportional to the length of service with the colors of soldiers or sailors other than French citizens shall be settled by decree.

GERMANY—ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE MINISTER OF WAR CONCERNING DISCHARGE FROM THE ARMY, NOVEMBER 16, 1918.

[From Sämtliche Kriegs-Gesetze, etc., 1919 (IV Ergänzungsheft zu Bd. 5, p. 211.]

Clothing, bonus, and traveling expenses: Every noncommissioned officer and private leaving the army on November 11, 1918, and thereafter shall receive—

(1) Without payment on his part: A suit of clothes, civilian, if possible, otherwise a uniform (which he already possesses).

(2) A war bonus of 50 marks.

(3) A lump sum of 15 marks for traveling expenses (i. e. in so far as he has a right to demand them).

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to speak a few moments in relation to this matter of sales. We stand to gain or lose by the methods adopted. I have nothing to say in relation to the individual who shall conduct the sales. I do not understand that any person is named in the bill to be employed to direct this business. The more money we can get in the hands of the Government the lower the taxation may become. Every dollar that we can save in getting a better price will be so much saved for the National Treasury, and the levy of taxes and loans can be reduced to that extent. Hence the best method should be adopted.

If you leave this matter to be handled by three or four or a dozen different branches of the departments you are likely to have men in charge of these sales who are not familiar with business, perchance an Army officer who was taken when a boy, educated at the expense of the Government, clothed, fed, and housed, and his profession made for him. He has not had an opportunity to learn what it means to earn a dollar. He expects the country to raise the dollar and pay it on his command. He is a commanding officer. That has been drilled into him, and he does not follow the ordinary lines that business men develop. If you have 10 or 12 men in the various branches of the departments you will be liable to dispose of the property for much less than you would if you centralize it and hold some man responsible for it in making the sales. On that proposition I believe the plan of the committee is sound. I have nothing to say in regard to the individuals employed in the matter. We must trust somebody. The Secretary of War is the administrative officer. In these matters he must be held responsible regardless of his politics, regardless of our view of what he has done in other contracts; we must give him the authority which will enable him to realize the largest benefit from the sale of this property. [Applause.]

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the chairman of the committee with reference to this item beginning in line 7, page 25:

And no greater sum than $50 for each deserter or escaped military prisoner—

And so forth.

Mr. KAHN. That has been the law for many years.

Mr. BEE. That is the Federal law—$50?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. BEE. That satisfies that question. I want to state that I am opposed to it. Now I direct the Chair's attention to line 12:

For a donation of $5 to each dishonorably discharged prisoner upon his release from confinement under court-martial sentence involving dishonorable discharge.

Is that the law?

Mr. KAHN. That is the law. These items, I want to say to my friend from Texas, have been carried in the appropriation bill in conformity with the existing law for many years.

Mr. BEE. I just want to say—thanking the chairman—with reference to this $50 in time of peace, that there are syndicates of ex-soldiers whose only business is to go out and apprehend deserters in order to collect that miserable $50. In reference to the $5, it amounts to absolutely nothing for a man dishonorably discharged from the service, confined in prison, who walks out a marked man with his stripes off, to give him $5 to enable him to get home; and the sooner we change that the better off this country will be.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

TRANSPORTATION OF THE ARMY AND ITS SUPPLIES.

For transportation of the Army and its supplies, including transportation of the troops when moving either by land or water, and of their baggage, including members of the Officers' Reserve Corps, enlisted men of the Enlisted Reserve Corps, and retired enlisted men when ordered to active duty, including the cost of packing and crating; for payment of travel pay to officers of the National Guard on their discharge from the service of the United States, as prescribed in the act approved March 2, 1901; for travel allowance to persons on their discharge from the United States disciplinary barracks or from any place in which they have been held under a sentence of dishonorable discharge and confinement for more than six months, or from the Government Hospital for the Insane after transfer thereto from such barracks or place, to their homes (or elsewhere as they may elect), provided the cost in each case shall not be greater than to the place of last enlistment; of the necessary agents and other employees, including per diem allowances in lieu of subsistence not exceeding $4 for those authorized to receive the per diem allowance; of clothing and equipage and other quartermaster stores from Army depots or places of purchase or delivery to the several posts and Army depots and from those depots to the troops in the field; for transportation of funds of the Army; for the payment of Army transportation lawfully due such land-grant railroads as have not received aid in Government bonds (to be adjusted in accordance with the decisions of the Supreme Court in cases decided under such land-grant acts), but in no case shall more than 50 per cent of full amount of service be paid: Provided, That such compensation shall be computed upon the basis of the tariff or lower special rates for like transportation performed for the public at large and shall be accepted as in full for all demands for such service: Provided further, That in expending the money appropriated by this act a railroad company which has not received aid in bonds of the United States and which obtained a grant of public land to aid in the construction of its railroad on conditions that such railroad should be a post route and military road, subject to the use of the United States for postal, military, naval, and other Government services, and also subject to such regulations as Congress may impose restricting the charge for such Government transportation, having claims against the United States for transportation of troops and munitions of war and military supplies and property over such aided railroads, shall be paid out of the moneys appropriated by the foregoing provisions only on the basis of such rate for the transportation of such troops and munitions of war and military supplies and property as the Secretary of War shall deem just and reasonable under the foregoing provision, such rate not to exceed 50 per cent of the compensation of such Government transportation as shall at that time be charged to and paid by private parties to any such company for like and similar transportation; and the amount so fixed to be paid shall be accepted as in full for all demands for such service: And provided further, That nothing in the preceding provisos shall be construed to prevent the accounting officers of the Government from making full payment to land-grant railroads for transportation of property or persons where the courts of the United States have held that such property or persons do not come within the scope of the deductions provided for in the land-grant acts; for the purchase and hire of draft and pack animals in such numbers as are actually required for the service, including reasonable provision for replacing unserviceable animals; for the purchase, hire, operation, maintenance, and repair of such harness, wagons, carts, drays, other vehicles, and motor-propelled and horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles as are required for the transportation of troops and supplies and for official, military, and garrison purposes; for drayage and cartage at the several depots; for the purchase and repair of ships, boats, and other vessels required for the transportation of troops and supplies and for official, military, and garrison purposes; for expenses of sailing public transports and other vessels on the various rivers, the Gulf of Mexico, and the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans: Provided further, That $225,000 of the appropriation hereby made shall be available for additional pay of employees on harbor boats, quartermaster service, in lieu of subsistence, $242,000,000.

Mr. KAHN. I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 29, line 14, strike out "$242,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$235,672,000."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I do this for the purpose, while the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] is present, of correcting an error concerning myself in his speech on page 710. In his speech on June 5, on page 710, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], among other things, said:

The gentleman knows that his letter reached the commission on the same day that these printed questionnaires were actually placed in the hands of more than 100,000 clerks.

I desire to read two letters. The first is as follows——

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will permit me to correct a statement affecting myself alone in the RECORD. It will only take a few minutes to read the letters.

Mr. DOWELL. I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa withdraws the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. On May 17, 1919, I mailed the following letter:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 17, 1919.

Hon. HENRY A. COOPER,
Hon. C. W. HAMLIN,
Hon. EDWARD KEATING,
Commission on Reclassification of Salaries, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: As soon as I noticed the published copy of the questionnaire which you are propounding to employees I discussed with your Mr. Hamlin the other day the question of submitting in a supplemental questionnaire certain interrogatories that would elicit information concerning which each Member of Congress would doubtless be interested when this subject comes up for consideration.

Mr. Hamlin stated that he would be glad to take up with me for discussion the form of supplemental questionnaire prepared by me, but I presume that pressure of business has prevented him from doing so.

I am inclosing each one of you gentlemen separately a copy of my proposed supplemental questionnaire, and I hope that you will see fit to submit it and require it to be answered by employees.

Very sincerely, yours,

THOMAS L. BLANTON.

In reply to my letter of May 17, I received the following:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
JOINT COMMISSION ON RECLASSIFICATION OF SALARIES,
Washington, May 20, 1919.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. BLANTON: Thank you very much for yours of the 18th instant. I have just finished reading it, and shall take the earliest opportunity to discuss your valuable suggestions with the other members of the committee. Both your letter and the accompanying blank form for a supplemental questionnaire are very interesting and suggestive.

I shall be pleased at any time to hear from you touching the difficult and important work of the commission.

With personal regards,

Very truly, yours,

HENRY ALLEN COOPER.

Thus the gentleman from Missouri was mistaken when he intimated that my request reached the commission too late for them to use it. I might therefore with propriety in the language of his own quotation, suggest to the distinguished gentleman: "There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio, than are dreamt of in your philosophy."

The Clerk read as follows:

CLOTHING AND CAMP AND GARRISON EQUIPAGE.

For cloth, woolens, materials, and for the purchase and manufacture of clothing for the Army, including enlisted men of the Regular Army Reserve and retired enlisted men when ordered to active duty, for members of the Reserve Training Corps; for issue and for sale at cost price according to the Army regulations; for payment for clothing not drawn due to enlisted men on discharge; for altering and fitting clothing and washing and cleaning when necessary; for equipment and repair of equipment of laundries, dry-cleaning plants, salvage, and sorting storehouses, hat repairing shops, shoe repair shops, clothing repair shops, and garbage reduction works; for equipage, including authorized issues of toilet articles, barbers' and tailors' materials, for use of general prisoners confined at military posts without pay or allowances and applicants for enlistment while held under observation; issue of toilet kits to recruits upon their first enlistment, and issue of housewives to the Army; for expenses of packing and handling, and similar necessaries; for a suit of citizens outer clothing, to cost not exceeding $10, to be issued upon release from confinement to each prisoner who has been confined under a court-martial sentence involving dishonorable discharge; to each enlisted man convicted by civil court for an offense resulting in confinement in a penitentiary or other civil prison; and to each enlisted man ordered interned by reason of the fact that he is an alien enemy, or, for the same reason, discharged without internment; for indemnity to officers and men of the Army for clothing and bedding, and so forth, destroyed since April 22, 1898, by order of medical officers of the Army for sanitary reasons, $25,000,000.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 30, line 5, insert after the word "reserve" the word "officers."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 31, line 5, strike out "$25,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$18,750,000."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HOCH having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 5312) to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for carrying out the act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

BARRACKS AND QUARTERS, PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Continuing the work of providing for the proper shelter and protection of officers and enlisted men of the Army of the United States lawfully on duty in the Philippine Islands, including repairs and payment of rents, the acquisition of title to building sites, and such additions to existing military reservations as may be necessary, and including also shelter for the animals and supplies, and all other buildings necessary for post administration purposes, and for shelter and repair thereof, and rentals for the United States troops in China, $150,000.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. JUUL. There is in line 12 a provision for United States troops in China. I suppose most Members are not familiar with the Chinese situation, and I would like to ask the chairman to state the situation concerning our troops in China?

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, under an international agreement entered into shortly after the close of the Boxer insurrection in China, the various countries whose ministers were surrounded in Peking decided to hold a certain number of their soldiers in China to protect that portion of the city where the legations are situated. I believe, so far as I remember, that we have had about a battalion of troops over there doing that work; a battalion of the old form, about 250 men. We are still keeping the troops there under that international agreement with the other countries of the world. They are all keeping their troops there.

Mr. JUUL. Now, may I ask the chairman what proportion of the $150,000 appropriated in this item does the gentleman think is being expended in maintaining troops in China?

Mr. KAHN. We have to pay rentals for quarters there. The amount is not very great. The War Department several years ago came to the committee and suggested that we construct permanent barracks there for our troops, but the Committee on Military Affairs did not deem it wise to follow that suggestion, and we are still paying rentals.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to address a parliamentary inquiry to the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JUUL. I want to know, Mr. Chairman, why it should be necessary for a Member of this Congress to make a motion or offer an amendment that is absolutely no amendment at all. For instance, the Chair suggested when I asked the question of the chairman of the committee that I moved to strike out the last word. If the Chair will permit, I had no desire whatever to strike out the last word.

It has seemed to me, Mr. Chairman, that every gentleman upon this floor has had an undying grudge against the last word here now for several years. I do not know of any time when they have gotten square with the last word and succeeded in striking it out. But every day the battery of big guns and little guns is directed against this unfortunate last word. I want to ask in good faith of the chairman of this committee why gentleman should move to strike out the last word in order to ask a direct question for information from the chairman of a committee? Why can not we just state what we want to know and not camouflage? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. In order that we may proceed in order there must be something pending that would entitle a man to the floor. Otherwise he would have to ask for unanimous consent in order to ask a gentleman a question.

Mr. JUUL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. He could ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute or five or ten.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted to suggest, unanimous consent might be refused.

The CHAIRMAN. It might be refused; but he would have a right to the floor by making the pro forma amendment to strike out the last word.

Mr. JUUL. If the Chair will pardon me, in order to hang up your hat or coat you have to have either a nail or a peg on which to hang it, but to strike out the last word——

The CHAIRMAN. The last word is the peg. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Illinois withdraws his pro forma amendment, and the Clerk will read.

The clerk read as follows:

CONSTRUCTION AND REPAIR OF HOSPITALS.

For construction and repair of hospitals at military posts already established and occupied, including the extra-duty pay of enlisted men employed on the same, and including also all expenditures for construction and repairs required at the Army and Navy Hospital at Hot Springs, Ark., and for the construction and repair of general hospitals and expenses incident thereto, and for additions needed to meet the requirements of increased garrisons, and for temporary hospitals in standing camps and cantonments; for the alteration of permanent buildings at posts for use as hospitals, construction and repairs of temporary hospital buildings at permanent posts, construction and repair of temporary general hospitals, rental or purchase of grounds, and rental and alteration of buildings for use for hospital purposes in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, for use during the existing emergency, including necessary temporary quarters for hospital personnel, outbuildings, heating and laundry apparatus, plumbing, waters and sewers, and electric work, cooking apparatus, and roads and walks for the same, $5,000,000.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. KAHN: Page 35, line 13, strike out the word "waters" and insert the word "water."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from California.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

VOCATIONAL TRAINING.

For the employment of the necessary civilian instructors in the most important trades, for the purchase of carpenter's, machinist's, mason's, electrician's, and such other tools and equipment as may be required, including machines used in connection with the trades, for the purchase of material and other supplies necessary for instruction and training purposes and the construction of such buildings needed for vocational training in agriculture for shops, storage, and shelter of machinery as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of section 27 of the act approved June 3, 1916, authorizing, in addition to the military training of soldiers while in the active service, means for securing an opportunity to study and receive instruction upon educational lines of such character as to increase their military efficiency and enable them to return to civil life better equipped for industrial, commercial, and general business occupations, part of this instruction to consist of vocational education either in agriculture or the mechanic arts, $10,500.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I call the attention of the members of the committee to a situation that has arisen in the payment of money, or rather the application of funds, under the provision of the soldiers' rehabilitation bill. I know that every member of the committee will be interested in learning the situation as it is. The rehabilitation bill provides that the eligibility of an applicant to be trained must be passed upon by the War Risk Insurance Bureau. That is the requirement of the law. The War Risk Insurance Bureau has had its work so piled up that all of us recognize it is pretty nearly at a point where it is not functioning. There are 4,000 applicants who have been injured and who desire to use the facilities provided for under the law but that are held up because the War Risk Insurance Bureau has not been able to pass on the cases. I have the figures, that I will ask to place in the RECORD, which give not only those who have made application, but those who are now being examined, which number will probably reach 7,000.

The War Risk Insurance ruling is one interpretation and the Vocational Board ruling is a different one. The War Risk Insurance says that for a disabled soldier to be eligible for reeducation he must be actually receiving the compensation, and in order to determine whether the compensation should be paid it passes upon two items; one is whether the injury was received in the pursuance of the line of duty, so as not to have been willful negligence on the part of the soldier, and the other is the degree of the injuries, so as to ascertain what would be the amount of compensation under the War Risk Insurance Bureau. And, as I said, there are 4,000 soldiers crippled that have made application to the board, whom the board wanted to enter upon the training of, but where it could not do so because they have not been passed upon by the bureau.

This confusion being so apparent, the bureau and the board have joined in a request that the matter be remedied by legislation in an amendment to the rehabilitation bill. That amendment was offefed in the Senate, reported from the Committee on Education and Labor, and was passed by the Senate unanimously. It came over here, was introduced, exactly as it passed the Senate, by myself, and the Committee on Education went over it and unanimously reported it, and it is now on the calendar. And if it is possible to get it before the House soon, so that this emergency can be met, and as has been recommended by Secretary Glass in a letter, which, if it is the pleasure of the committee, I will put in the RECORD, it will be a good thing to do.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will yield.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman be kind enough to tell us just what provision the amendment makes for the examination of these men for entry into the training schools?

Mr. FESS. I will. The amendment makes two modifications of the bill. The first modification is the change of the amount to be received by the soldier while in training. The war-risk insurance law says that it will be either what he is receiving as an enlisted man on the pay roll or his compensation—whichever is the larger. So it put an officer's allowance quite beyond that received by the private soldier.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be given five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FESS. The officer, for example, might get $200 a month, while the private would get but $30, but in addition to the $30 he would have his keep and a certain amount of clothing and his board while in the service. But the bureau has ruled that when he passes over into the vocational training the board, the lodging, and so on, stop. So an officer would be supported in training at $200, while the private would get only $30. That was not the intention of the law at all, and therefore the amendment fixes the price generally at $75 per month, in the belief that it costs that much. That is the minimum.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. In both cases?

Mr. FESS. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOWELL. Alike to officers and men?

Mr. FESS. Yes. So far as the training goes, there is no desire to discriminate in favor of officer against private.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MADDEN. Before the gentleman yields, I wish he would finish the answer to my question.

Mr. FESS. If the gentleman will wait, I would like to finish the answer to the question of the gentleman from Illionis [Mr. MADDEN]. The other change of the law is that the Federal board, instead of the War Risk Insurance Bureau, will be the judge as to the eligibility of the applicant for the training in the belief that if it was the purpose of Congress when it passed the rehabilitation bill to put it in the power of the Vocational Educational Board to direct the education, that it would also mean that the board could settle whether the person is sufficiently in need of training as to warrant it, and therefore could be safely intrusted with the decision on the eligibility for training.

Mr. MADDEN. And also so situated that they could pass promptly upon the cases?

Mr. FESS. Yes. They could pass at once upon the cases, which under the present situation can not be reached within reasonable time.

Another thing that I think the Members would all be glad to know is that this bill will transfer, upon the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, the amount that would come out of the Bureau of War Risk in the way of payment of compensation to the Federal board to be applied in support of training. So that if the $6,000,000 that is asked for in the amendment is fully understood, it will be readily observed that it is no addition to the Government's obligation but is simply paying out by one board that which was paid out before by another.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman explain what success is being had in the vocational work at the hospitals?

Mr. FESS. I will be glad if the membership will give me the right to place that statement in the RECORD. It is quite complete as to what work has already been done under the administration of this law. I would rather not take the time now to read it, but if it will be satisfactory I would be glad to be allowed to put it in the RECORD.

Mr. DOWELL. I hope the gentleman will do that.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a statement of the operations of the board under this law.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the statement referred to:

I. THE POLICY OF THE BOARD IN ITS INTERPRETATION OF THE INTENT AND SPIRIT OF THE ACT.

1. That the Congress wanted all disabled men to know of their rights and opportunities under the war-risk insurance act and the vocational rehabilitation act.

This means reaching every disabled man with the information.

2. That the Congress wanted every disabled man entitled to training or placement and needing it to have its benefits.

This means the careful consideration of the case of every man applying for the help of the board under the act, in order to determine whether he should have training and what training, or placement and what placement.

3. That the Congress wanted every disabled man needing training or placement, or both, to be reached and helped as rapidly as possible, so that he might be saved from privation and dependency.

This means that the board must maintain a force large enough to establish contacts, as rapidly as possible, both with disabled men before their discharge from the service and with those additional thousands of disabled men discharged from the service previous to the passage of the vocational rehabilitation act.

4. That the Congress wanted the work of vocational rehabilitation for men disabled by the war to be done as well as is humanly possible, so that the hopes of these men that by training they may overcome their handicaps may be realized.

This means that the board must employ competent persons, in temporary positions, to advise, to train, and to assist in placing disabled men in successful employment, and to pay temporary salaries sufficient to attract and hold competent experts in the service of the board.

5. That the Congress desired that the work should be conducted by the board in such a way as to avoid all foolish and unnecessary expenditures, while at the same time providing the very best training possible.

The board has saved the Government millions of dollars in the cost of plant and equipment by using the existing educational facilities of the country instead of attempting to erect or operate Government schools. Moreover, by employing a large force since the signing of the armistice it has, up to May 1, 1919, been able to reach 52,144 disabled men in hospitals, at an approximate cost for this item of $5 per man, while the failure to reach these men at the hospital would have entailed a cost of at least $50 per man, a saving in cost of approximately $2,346,460 through the policy adopted.

6. That the Congress wanted a flexible and generous interpretation of the act instead of a narrow and technical one, so that the need for vocational rehabilitation of every worthy disabled soldier, sailor, or marine should be met.

This means giving the benefit of any doubt to the disabled soldier, sailor, or marine.

7. That at the close of the work the board should be in a position to report to the Congress that it had established contact with every man discharged from the service with a disability of 10 per cent or more, had informed him of his rights and opportunities, and had met the just need for vocational training or placement of all worthy cases.

II. Funds Available for the Work During the Current Fiscal Year (1918–19).

By the vocational rehabilitation act approved June 27, 1918, and supplementary legislation approved February 26, 1919, Congress made a continuing fund of $2,000,000 available for the training and placement of men disabled in the war. In addition $77,025 was received from private sources and deposited in the special fund for vocational rehabilitation authorized by the act, making a total of $2,077,025 received for the uses of the board.

III. Work Accomplished with the Money.

1. Organization set up:

IN FRANCE.

A bureau of information for disabled soldiers was established at Paris, and a field service carried on in cooperation with the American Red Cross established contact with practically every disabled American soldier before his return to this country.

IN THIS COUNTRY.

A vocational rehabilitation division of the board was created with a chief and staff of superintendents and assistants for special phases of the work. In order properly to reach the disabled men in hospitals and in the field 14 district offices were established—at Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Washington, Atlanta, New Orleans, Cincinnati, Chicago, St. Louis, Minneapolis, Denver, San Francisco, Seattle, and Dallas—and representatives of the board stationed at practically all cities of over 100,000 population. The work of registering the cases of disabled men and of advising, training, and placing them is in each district in charge of a district officer with a force of supervisors, clerical assistants, and field agents. The total number of employees of the board on May 1 was 1,142, of which 351 were employed at the central office and 791 by the district offices.

2. Information for the men (publications and publicity):

It was necessary to publish pamphlets and magazine and newspaper articles informing disabled men and their friends, employers, and wage workers, and the public generally concerning the generous provision Congress has made for the vocational rehabilitation of those injured or diseased by the war, and to supply information to disabled men and others as to the requirements and opportunities for desirable employment in many hundreds of professional, agricultural, commercial, and industrial occupations. Since July 1 the board has published and distributed in France, on transports, and to soldiers, sailors, marines, and civilians in this country the following material:

Forms, issues, and quantities printed and distributed.

Forms.	Issues.	Copies printed.
Posters, pictorial and printed	4 designs	45,300
Leaflets, blouse pocket size	8 titles	2,000,009
Monographs and bulletins	41 titles	4,000,000
Monthly periodical, Vocational Summary	12 issues	580,000

GROUPS TO WHICH PUBLICATIONS HAVE BEEN ADDRESSED.

Disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines.
Dependents of disabled men.
Teachers of disabled men.
Employers and fellow workmen.
General public.

3. Getting in touch with the men:

IN FRANCE.

Work overseas reported by Federal board agents in France, as of February 15, 1919:

Number of talks in huts and hospital wards	3,456
Number of disabled men reached by these talks	120,646
Number of personal conferences with disabled men	52,968
Number of blanks filled out by men interested in training upon return to United States	18,878

IN THIS COUNTRY.

Work accomplished by district offices in reaching men with information, contact, and help, as of April 26, 1919:

Total number of disabled men of all kinds registered with board	81,741
Average number of new cases registered per day, Mar. 16–Apr. 26	776

4. Advising with disabled men:

IN FRANCE AND ON TRANSPORTS.

The figures for men reached in hospitals in France have already been given above. Substantially all these men were reached again on transports through the publications of the board distributed by morale officers and the American Red Cross.

IN THIS COUNTRY.

In considering the needs of disabled men the board has, through hospital, district office, and field service, surveyed, through conference, advice, recommendation as to disposal of case, and the preparation of papers for compensation training and placement the following cases:

Total number of cases surveyed to Apr. 26	52,367
Average number of new cases surveyed per day, Mar. 16–Apr. 26	611
Estimated number of cases yet to be surveyed	60,000
Total problem of survey (estimated)	112,367

5. Deciding each man's case:

Volume of daily business.

Average daily number of cases recommended for training by districts to central office during April	117
Average daily number of notices of men placed in training	33
Average daily notices from Bureau of War Risk Insurance as to new claims filed for compensation	1,172
Average daily number of daily letters from men and friends	200
Average daily number of applications for compensation filed by board with bureau	254
Average daily notices of discharge of disabled men from the War Department to the Federal board	400
Total daily number of communications about disabled men received at central office	2,175

THE WORK OF THE CASE BOARDS.

In each district office a case board, consisting of the district officer, a medical officer, an employer, and a representative of labor, pass upon the request of the disabled man and the recommendation of the vocational adviser of the board who surveyed his case, as to whether he should have training and what training. The recommendation of the district case board is sent to Washington, where it is approved or disapproved by the central office case board. Up to April 26 the following work had been done:

Number of cases recommended by district case board for training	7,504
Number of cases disapproved by district case board	213
Number of new cases per day recommended by district case boards (March and April)	86
Number of cases approved by central office case board	4,106
Number of cases pending approval in central office and awaiting action on compensation by the War Risk Insurance Bureau	3,398

6. Training the disabled man:

THE SIZE OF THE PROBLEM.

As it is impossible to state this in exact figures, estimates are made on the basis of known facts and the experience of the board up to this time.

Known facts.

1. Number of cases recommended for training by district case boards	7,504

7. Institutions used for training and teachers:

The main work of training is being done with the facilities of regular institutions in regular or special classes. On March 15 the class of institutions providing training for disabled men was as follows:

Commercial schools	72
Agricultural schools	83
Industrial schools	89
State universities	28
Universities other than State	46
Normal schools	4
Grammar schools	1
Secondary schools	13
Special schools	6
Hospitals	3
Shops and companies	16
Tutors	2
Total	363

On May 15 the number of workshops and other industrial establishments where 126 men were being trained had been increased to 79.

Since March 15 the board has established a total of 30 receiving stations or schools, where nearly 300 men are in training as cases under investigation to test their possibilities, overcome illiteracy, and give preliminary training.

In addition the board is operating for the Navy a scheme of curative workshops and trade training at the navy yards and hospitals at Norfolk and Charleston, and is establishing other centers at Portsmouth, Chelsea, League Island (Philadelphia), and Mare Island (San Francisco). It has also installed a scheme of preliminary training for discharged tuberculous men in sanatoria at Sanatorium, N. C.; Rutland, Mass.; El Paso, Tex.; and Albuquerque, N. Mex., where such men have been placed for treatment by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.

8. Placing the disabled man:

The law requires the board to assist disabled men to find employment who do not need or want training, and also to place those who have taken training. Each case is a separate problem. Often placement is made to test whether the man needs training. Difficulties arise because of the prejudice against the employment of handicapped persons. In some States the provisions of the compensation laws make the employment of disabled men a serious step for employers. In placing the handicapped soldier as a temporary ward of the Government the agents of the board must protect him from exploitation hazards and unhygienic surroundings. This requires a great deal of attention to each case. In discharging this task the board is cooperating with all national, State, and local agencies, public and private, concerned with employment and social problems. Much advice has been given to men with slight disabilities not placed by us. Others have been assisted in applications for compensation and pay troubles. In all, the amount of correspondence and personal contact for each case is very large and can not be represented by mere figures.

V. FUNDS NEEDED FOR VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION—AN ESTIMATE FOR 1919–20.

It is difficult to make anything but the most approximate estimate of the cost in money per man for training or placement, as no two cases are alike, and even in countries which have been carrying on this work for a much longer period than the United States definite costs statistics are not yet available.

A prominent official of the department of soldiers' civil reestablishment, of Canada, estimates that the total cost of training and subsistence per man averages there about $1,000, but it must be remembered that in Canada the civilian department assumes the whole cost of subsisting the man and his dependents, his pension being suspended during the period of his training.

The figures will be lower, so far as the budget of the Federal board is concerned, since the Bureau of War Risk Insurance pays each man in training at least $30 per month to the single man, with considerable additions if he has dependents, leaving the board to pay the difference between that amount and what is deemed necessary to support him while he is training. On the other hand the length of course of instruction in Canada is somewhat shorter than with us, thus tending to increase American cost over those of Canada. The greatest difficulty is to figure either the total numbers to be trained or the number in training at any given time.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I believe the gentleman promised to yield to me.

Mr. FESS. Yes; I yield to my friend.

Mr. JUUL. I want to ask the gentleman from Ohio if it is a fact, for instance, that an officer in the United States Army, not the Regular Army, who has lost a leg, is granted a compensation amounting to between $7 and $8 a month when he is retired, whereas an officer of the Regular Army, meaning a West Point graduate, will be granted from half to two-thirds pay? Will the gentleman tell what is the situation?

Mr. FESS. I am not informed on that.

Mr. JUUL. The information that the gentleman proposes to give will not cover that point?

Mr. FESS. I think not. That has not been called to my attention at all.

May I ask the committee to have a sympathetic respect for this emergency bill and assist me in getting it before the House as soon as possible? There are 4,000 already on the list waiting, and they claim there are 3,000 additional to be examined, and I think we ought, in the spirit of the law originally passed, to make this effective just as soon as possilbe. I have not urged it heretofore on account of these other appropriation bills.

In order that a better understanding of the situation may be had by the members, I herein append a statement of the vocational director handed me a few days ago:

STATEMENT BY C. A. PROSSER, DIRECTOR OF THE FEDERAL BOARD FOR VOCATIONAL EDUCATION.

The Treasury Department and the Federal Board for Vocational Education join earnestly in the request that this bill be reported favorably by the committee and passed at the earliest possible moment. The board asks for the relief given by the bill for these reasons:

[1] The rapid increase in the number of soldiers to be trained and the volume of the work for the months of April, May, and June make it certain that all of this money will be necessary to meet the increasing expenditures of the board for the travel and subsistence of disabled men and administrative costs by July 1, 1919.

I.

In its present form section 2 of the vocational rehabilitation law has been interpreted by the board and the bureau so differently that the law can not be properly and promptly administered for the benefit of disabled men needing immediate training.

1. As set forth in section 2 of the law, a disabled man must meet three conditions in order to be eligible to its benefits: (1) He must have been disabled under circumstances entitling him to compensation under the war-risk insurance act. (2) Vocational training must be necessary to overcome the handicap of his disability. (3) Finally, vocational training must be feasible.

In entire good faith the bureau has, in the discharge of its duty and responsibility, so interpreted the first of these conditions as to practically take out of the hands of the board the administration of the law and make it impossible for the board properly to discharge the duties imposed upon it by the Congress.

The bureau has interpreted the condition that the disabled man must have been disabled under circumstances entitling him to compensation under the war-risk insurance to mean not only that the circumstances under which he was injured or diseased must be such as to make him eligible for compensation, but also that he must, at the time he is placed in training by the board, actually be in receipt of compensation from the bureau.

On the other hand, the Federal board has taken the position that disabled under circumstances entitling him to compensation means only that the circumstances under which the disability was incurred must be such as to make the disabled man entitled to consideration for compensation whether he ever applies for such compensation, ever receives it, or, once receiving it, has it later withdrawn for any reason by the bureau.

In determining the compensability of a disabled man, the bureau passes upon two questions: The first is, Were the circumstances under which the disability was incurred such as to make the man eligible for compensation? This involves all such matters as whether the disability was incurred while in line of duty in active service, and whether the injury or disease was due to his own willful misconduct. The second question, entirely separate and apart from the question of the circumstances under which the disability was incurred, is that of whether the disabled man is entitled to compensation, and what compensation, because of his disability. This involves all such matters as whether the disability is temporary or permanent; whether it is large or small; and possibly the extent to which the disability constitutes a handicap to the man in the light of all the factors in his individual case.

By its interpretation of section 2 of the vocational rehabilitation law the bureau has, in effect, added to the condition that the circumstances under which the disability was incurred must be such as to entitle the man to consideration for compensation by the bureau the further condition that the man is not eligible for training by the board until the disability itself has been passed upon as compensable by the bureau, under the rules, regulations, policies, and procedure established for the purpose.

This same section 2 provides that when a disabled man has been placed in training by the Federal board, the bureau shall suspend all payments to him under the war-risk insurance act and pay to him under the vocational rehabilitation act a monthly amount equal to his monthly pay for the last month of his active service, or an amount equal to the compensation to which he would otherwise be entitled as compensation under the war-risk insurance act, whichever amount is the greater. A subsequent section (sec. 8) of the vocational rehabilitation act authorizes the Federal board to make such a supplementary allowance to the man as is necessary properly to provide for his support while in training.

Inasmuch as the bureau, acting in good faith in the light of its interpretation of section 2, will not pay any money to a disabled soldier placed in training by the board, unless he was actually in receipt of compensation by the bureau, it has been necessary for the board to submit to the policy of the bureau until such time as relief from an impossible situation could be secured from the Congress.

The board believed, and still believes, that when the board has, as the administrative agency designated by Congress for providing vocational reeducatien for a disabled man, satisfied itself that the circumstances under which the disability was incurred are such as to make him eligible for consideration for compensation by the bureau, and has, in the exercise of the discretion authorized by the law, determined that the disabled man needs training to overcome his handicap and that the training prescribed can be given successfully, the board has the legal right and duty to place the man in training, and it becomes the duty of the bureau to pay him while in training the monthly pay provided in section 2 of the act. No other plan can do prompt justice by the men handicapped by injury or disease incurred in the war.

In order, however, to reach and help as many disabled men as possible under these difficult circumstances, the Federal board conformed to the requirements of the bureau, and up to May 10 submitted for the determination of the bureau as to compensability the applications for compensation of 26,814 disabled men, who were assisted in preparing their cases by the district offices of the board, this number being over and above a much larger number of applications filed by disabled men themselves directly with the bureau. Of these applications filed by disabled men through the Federal board 8,622 were the cases of men already surveyed by our district officers and recommended by our district case boards to the central office for training. More than 4,000 of these cases have not as yet been adjudicated by the bureau, and therefore can not safely be put into training by the board until it knows whether they would receive any pay from the bureau under its interpretation of the act.

With the passage of this proposed bill, amending section 2, the board could immediately proceed with the training of these men, most of whom are so handicapped that they can not work successfully without reeducation and can not undertake employment now without grave danger of further serious physical or mental injury. This, of course, takes no account of the further fact that the new cases of disabled men recommended for training by our district officers are pouring into the central office at the rate of more than 100 per day, so that every day the situation grows worse.

II.

The change in section 2 of the vocational rehabilitation act proposed by this bill is as necessary for the relief of the War Risk Insurance Bureau as for the Federal Board for Vocational Education. Hence the joint request for its enactment.

1. The Federal board recognizes fully that the bureau is dealing with a very difficult problem in the administration of the provisions of the war-risk insurance act regulating the award of compensation to disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines. Personally I believe that nothing short of a practical revision of that act at the earliest possible moment will either give to those disabled by the war the prompt and just compensation to which they are entitled and which the Congress intended they should receive or make the act a law capable of consistent and successful administration.

In determining a man's compensation for disability the bureau must investigate many questions that sometimes require months to settle. The Federal board is charged with the duty of rendering for a temporary period a service which a disabled man should have at once if he is to be properly rehabilitated. The bureau is charged, on the other hand, with determining for what in many cases will be the permanent period of a man's expectancy of life, the question as to whether he should have compensation, and what that compensation should be in his individual case. These questions involve such factors as the nature, character, and extent of his disability, his marital relations, the number, age, and relationship of his dependents, his income before the war, his present earnings, and many other such questions. These often require many papers, many affidavits, many investigations, and extensive correspondence with many persons over widely scattered territory.

In the meantime, those disabled men whom the board wishes to put into training at once must wait often for many weary months, while their compensation status is being determined, before the board can proceed with their schooling. Handicapped so they either can not work at all or can work only for small wage, at grave risk to their health or mentality, their condition is a sad one, and their spirit of disappointment and justifiable discontent one which none of us can view without sympathy and alarm.

2. By the adoption of the proposed amendment to section 2 both bureau and board would secure immediate relief from the present complex and confused situation. The board would at once provide vocational rehabilitation for more than 4,000 handicapped men, who have been waiting months for his help, and handle promptly all new cases of men needing training, of whom there will be, in my opinion, about 10,000. The bureau would at once be relieved of any further responsibility under the vocational rehabilitation act and could proceed, without pressure, confusion, or controversy with the Federal board, to determine the compensability of this large group of disabled men pursuing courses under the Federal board, and therefore provided with proper support for themselves and their dependents while going to school.

When compensation has been awarded to such men in training, the bureau would, under the proposed amendment to section 2, be relieved of the making of payments for compensation to more than 95 out of 100 of them during their period of training, as the support provided by the board would be larger than their compensation, and therefore in lieu of all compensation while they are going to school. This would leave the bureau, under the amendment, to make payments to only those men in training (less than 5 of every 100) whose compensation was in excess of the amount received for support from the board.

III.

The appropriation of money provided in the proposed bill amending section 2 of the vocational rehabilitation law involves no additional expenditure of money, but only the payment by the board, to the disabled man in training, of the total amount which he received under the present law by separate checks from board and bureau.

1. Under the present law, for example, the disabled man without dependents receives, while in training, a total of $75 per month for his support. The bureau pays him an amount which in no case can be less than either his last monthly pay while in the service or his compensation, whichever is the greater. The board pays the remaining sum necessary to give him the $75 guaranteed for his support. By the proposed amendment payments from the bureau would be suspended during the period of training and the man paid the total of $75 by the board. This would make no difference in the total amount now received by the man, and therefore no difference in the expenditures by the Government on him.

2. At the present time the board has placed in training about 3,200 men, whose average period of instruction is 10 months. More than 4,000 additional cases are now awaiting the award of compensation before being given courses of instruction, and the new cases recommended by the districts for training are coming in at the rate of about 500 per week. It is estimated that the average number of men in training during the fiscal year 1919–20 will be 7,000. At the rate of $75 per months the support of these men will require $525,000 per month, or $6,300,000 for the year. Hence the request for the appropriation to carry out section 2 as amended.

The amendment proposed is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5225) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for vocational rehabilitation and return to civil employment of disabled persons discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 27, 1918.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 of the act entitled "An act to provide for vocational rehabilitation and return to civil employment of disabled persons discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 27, 1918, be hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That every person enlisted, enrolled, drafted, inducted, or appointed in the military or naval forces of the United States, including members of training camps authorized by law, who, since April 7, 1917, has resigned or has been discharged or furloughed therefrom under honorable conditions, having a disability incurred, increased, or aggravated while a member of such forces, or later developing a disability traceable in the opinion of the board to service with such forces, and who, in the opinion of the Federal Board for Vocational Education is in need of vocational rehabilitation to overcome the handicap of such disability, shall be furnished by the said board, where vocational rehabilitation is feasible, such course of vocational rehabilitation as the board shall prescribe and provide.

"The board shall have the power, and it shall be its duty, to furnish the persons included in this section suitable courses of vocational rehabilitation, to be prescribed and provided by the board; and every person electing to follow such a course of vocational rehabilitation shall, while following the same, be paid monthly by the said board from the appropriation hereinafter provided such sum as in the judgment of the said board is necessary for his maintenance and support and for the maintenance and support of persons depending upon him, if any: Provided, however, That in no event shall the sum so paid such person while pursuing such course be more than $75 per month for a single man without dependents, or for a man with dependents $75 per month plus the several sums prescribed as family allowances under section 204 of article 2 of the war-risk insurance act.

"No compensation under article 3 of the act entitled 'An act to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department,"' approved October 6, 1917, shall be paid for the period during which any such person is being furnished by said board a course of vocational rehabilitation and support as herein authorized: Provided, however, That in the event any person pursuing a course of vocational rehabilitation is entitled under said article 3 to compensation in an amount in excess of the payments made to him by the said board for his support and the support of his dependents, if any, the Bureau of War Risk Insurance shall pay monthly to such person such additional amount as may be necessary to equal the total compensation due under said article 3 of said act.

"There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, available immediately and until expended, the sum of $6,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be used by the Federal Board for Vocational Education for the purpose of making the payments prescribed by this section and for defraying the administrative expenses incident thereto."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask that the gentleman's time be extended half a minute in order to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Ohio be extended half a minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOCHT. I do not want to delay the committee, but I wanted to ask the gentleman what information he could give with respect to American soldiers who are now attending colleges in England? For instance, I had a letter recently from a young man, a soldier, who is on his way back from France, and in that letter he recited the story of how he is attending school there, presumably at the expense of the Government. Is that at our expense, and if so, now that the war is over, why do they not return to the United States and attend some school or university here?

Mr. FESS. We have what may be accounted one of the greatest universities in the world in Europe under American management, in which our soldiers are pupils.

Mr. FOCHT. Is that in England?

Mr. FESS. It is at Beaune.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has again expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the procurement and supply as provided in section 56 of the act of Congress approved June 3, 1916, of such tentage and equipment, including the transporting of same, as the Secretary of War shall deem necessary for proper military training to schools and colleges other than those provided for in section 47 of the act above referred to, $100.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask what military schools and colleges we have in the United States equal to that at Champaign, Ill., and whether the United States Government contributes to military education?

Mr. KAHN. This item does not cover the West Point Military Academy, which after all is the only military academy which we have. But there are several laws which provide for military training in various schools and colleges throughout the country. The Morrill Act, which was passed in the early sixties, gave certain colleges and universities in the various States certain areas of land provided they gave military instruction and also established a college of agriculture. I think there is such a university at present in every State in the Union. In addition to that the national defense act, which was approved, as the gentleman knows, on June 3, 1916, contained a proviso that various schools and colleges throughout the country can apply to the Secretary of War for equipment and, during certain periods of the year, give their students military training at encampments during vacations. Those schools and colleges also receive for their students ammunition and small arms—rifles. This year there is no intention to have this outdoor training, and therefore the item in the bill is carried just to keep the item alive. The appropriation is only nominal. It is $100. It is provided for under the national defense act, and possibly on some other occasion, if we do not provide this nominal appropriation in this bill, some Member of the House may make a point of order and have it stricken from the bill.

Mr. JUUL. If the gentleman will pardon me, from line 6 to line 12, on page 39, you propose to expend a total of $100 upon these colleges outside of West Point. Where do these colleges get the money?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. KAHN. If the camps were to be held this year the amount would be largely in excess of the amount carried in the bill, and naturally that money would be expended for these maneuvers and this training. But as the camps are not to be held, it was deemed advisable just to make a nominal appropriation.

Mr. JUUL. Just to keep the paragraph in the bill?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. FESS. The colleges and universities are glad to have this instruction given and regard it as very important to the students because it is such an advantage to the esprit de corps of the students.

Mr. KAHN. And the Government details some officer of the Regular Army to give the necessary instruction and training.

Mr. McKENZIE and Mr. McKEOWN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE], a member of the committee, will be recognized first.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I want to take two or three minutes to say that if my colleague [Mr. JUUL] will consult the hearings he will find, on pages 228 and 229, a list of these colleges and schools where they have a training corps. And I want to say further, for the information of the members of the committee, that the wisdom of some of the provisions of the national defense act is fully exemplified by a statement which I want to read. An officer, Maj. Lewis, testified before our committee that there were practically 100,000 young men taking training in this country as officers in our Military Establishment. I asked him the following questions:

Mr. McKENZIE. Do I understand you to say we have practically 100,000 young men taking training as officers?
Maj. LEWIS. Yes, sir.
Mr. McKENZIE. In this country?
Maj. LEWIS. Yes, sir.
Mr. McKENZIE. One hundred thousand?
Maj. LEWIS. The exact figures are 99,695 at present.
Mr. ANTHONY. You include in this training students from the high schools where they have military organizations?
Maj. LEWIS. Yes, sir.

Then further down on the page I asked him—

Are you sufficiently familiar with the work in these schools and colleges to be able to say whether they get such training as to be of real value to a military man?

Maj. LEWIS. He does in the advanced course. When he has completed four years he has received as much training as a lieutenant in the Reserve Corps; in other words, he is fitted for a second lieutenant in the Reserve Corps.

Mr. McKENZIE. Has he such qualifications that you would consider he was a man fitted to take charge of a company of men, such as a battalion or squad?

Maj. LEWIS. His qualifications are such he could take care of a platoon of men, a platoon of Infantry; he has the training and education in general to do that.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I think it is a matter of congratulation, and it ought to be a matter of some satisfaction to the people of this country, that while we have no great military system, we have 100,000 of our young men in the schools and colleges of our country who are taking such useful military training as will enable them to take part in any future war we may have. [Applause.]

Mr. McKEOWN. I move to strike out the last two words. I should like to ask a question for information. I want to inquire as to the training of veterinary surgeons, whether there is to be a school established to train veterinarians for the Army? I have heard considerable complaint about that matter, and I wanted to inquire if there was anything in the bill about that.

Mr. KAHN. There is no item in the bill that I can recall which provides for such a school, but, of course, that would be a matter for the War Department. They would probably ask for an appropriation if they contemplated organizing such a school. So far as I recall, there was no such request made of the committee.

Mr. McKEOWN. I notice an item of $350,000 under the head of pay of officers on page 16, line 19, for the pay of reserve veterinarians.

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. I was not here yesterday afternoon at the time that item was considered. That is my reason for asking a question about it now.

Mr. KAHN. There are a great many reserve veterinarians in the department at this time who are doing a very useful work.

Of course, the Veterinary Corps in the Regular Army is comparatively small. During the war, when we had several hundred thousand animals, it became necessary to have a large number of veterinarians, in addition to the force in our Regular Army, and they were all put into what they call the veterinarian's reserve. They were doing a very useful work in Europe, as well as in this country.

In Europe many of our horses were stricken with mange and lice. I found in the occupied territory especially that large numbers of our animals were suffering from these diseases. Every horse and mule had to be given careful treatment, and was being given careful treatment. I assume that it will be necessary for the Army to continue the services of a fairly large number of reserve veterinarians during the coming fiscal year to take care of our animals.

Mr. McKEOWN. The complaint that came to me was that graduates of such schools as McKellops of Chicago and other well-established schools were not given any recognition in that arm of the service.

Mr. KAHN. I had the matter up with the department some years ago about graduates from veterinary colleges, and at that time it was the policy of the department to give the graduates of recognized schools of that kind every facility to go into the Army.

Mr. McKEOWN. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. BEE. I move to strike out the last word. I listened to the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] with reference to 100,000 young men taking military training in colleges. I want to ask him if those colleges he speaks of are the public schools in this country or are land-grant institutions?

Mr. McKENZIE. The land-grant colleges are included, though, as a matter of fact, before we passed the national defense act they were compelled in those colleges to give a certain amount of military training.

Mr. BEE. Yes; I understand that.

Mr. McKENZIE. But in the national defense act we made provision so that the War Department could recognize other schools, providing they would comply with the regulations laid down by the War Department, and whenever they did comply with the regulations of the War Department, then under the national defense act the War Department was authorized to detail officers to those schools as instructors.

Mr. BEE. Then, as I understand it, it is not only the land-grant colleges but the private schools which have complied with the War Department regulations.

Mr. McKENZIE. Under the national defense act it is provided that any school having 100 male students over the age of 16 years may have an Army officer detailed as an instructor.

Mr. BEE. And there is where the 100,000 young men are found?

Mr. McKENZIE. That is it.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Is the 100,000 in addition to those in the land-grant colleges?

Mr. McKENZIE. No; in all.

Mr. DOWELL. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question.

Mr. McKENZIE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman from Illinois advise the committee what is the military status of these boys who take this course in these colleges? What relation do they have to the Army?

Mr. McKENZIE. They have no connection with the Army, but in case of a war like the one we have just passed through, when the War Department calls for men and officers, these young men would have the qualifications that would enable them to be commissioned in the Reserve Corps of the United States.

Mr. DOWELL. But they have no relation whatever to the Army, except that they receive the training by an Army officer?

Mr. McKENZIE. That is it. They have the qualifications.

Mr. DOWELL. The War Department furnishes the instruction to these institutions?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. And they are under regular military drill and training?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

The Clerk read as follows:

MEDICAL DEPARTMENT.

MEDICAL AND HOSPITAL DEPARTMENT.

For the manufacture and purchase of medical and hospital supplies, including disinfectants for military posts, camps, hospitals, hospital ships, and transports, for laundry work for enlisted men and Army nurses while patients in a hospital, and supplies required for mosquito destruction in and about military posts in the Canal Zone, $5,000,000: Provided, That the Secretary of War may, in his discretion, select types and makes of motor ambulances for the Army and authorize their purchase without regard to the laws prescribing advertisement for proposals for supplies and materials for the Army; for the purchase of veterinary supplies and hire of veterinary surgeons; for expenses of medical supply depots; for medical care and treatment not otherwise provided for, including care and subsistence in private hospitals, of officers, enlisted men, and civilian employees of the Army, of applicants for enlistment, and of prisoners of war and other persons in the military custody or confinement, when entitled thereto by law, regulation, or contract: Provided further, That this shall not apply to officers and enlisted men who are treated in private hospitals or by civilian physicians while on furlough; for the proper care and treatment of epidemic and contagious diseases in the Army or at military posts or stations, including measures to prevent the spread thereof, and the payment of reasonable damages not otherwise provided for, for bedding and clothing injured or destroyed in such prevention; for the pay of male and female nurses, not including the Nurse Corps (female), and of cooks and other civilians employed for the proper care of sick officers and soldiers, under such regulations fixing their number, qualifications, assignments, pay, and allowances as shall have been or shall be prescribed by the Secretary of War; for the pay of civilian physicians employed to examine physically applicants for enlistment and enlisted men; and to render other professional services from time to time under proper authority; for the pay of other employees of the Medical Department; for the payment of express companies and local transfers employed directly by the Medical Department for the transportation of medical and hospital supplies, including bidders' samples and water for analysis; for supplies for use in teaching the art of cooking to the enlisted force of the Medical Department; for the supply of the Army and Navy Hospital at Hot Springs, Ark.; for advertising, printing, binding, laundry, and all other necessary miscellaneous expenses of the Medical Department.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 40, line 8, after the words "Canal Zone," strike out "$5,000,000," and on page 41, line 19, strike out the period and insert in lieu thereof a comma and the sum of "$4,000,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on page 40, line 11, by striking out the word "without" and adding the word "having."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HULINGS: Page 40, line 11, strike out the word "without" and insert in lieu thereof the word "having."

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, unless there is some special reason why the Secretary of War in this particular should have the right to purchase without regard to the law prescribing advertisements for proposals to furnish supplies, I think this amendment should be agreed to.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, this language has been in the bill for a great many years. There are times when supplies—for instance, medical supplies—should be obtained immediately.

Mr. HULINGS. This is not for medical supplies; it is for motor ambulances.

Mr. KAHN. I remember that we had that up in the committee recently, probably within the last year or two. There were to be various makes of ambulances, and the gentleman's colleague [Mr. CRAGO] is fully familiar with the matter. I will ask him to explain it.

Mr. CRAGO. The explanation is that they are experimenting with different types of ambulances, and in order to get them built and furnished they could not be advertised for and bought in the usual way of purchasing anything of that kind. It is for the purpose of developing a satisfactory type that they had this language put in the bill.

Mr. HULINGS. It occurs to me that we have gone a long way in the direction of giving various officials unlimited authority to do what they like. It has seemed to be necessary in times gone by that that right should be limited by requiring a regard for the laws prescribing advertisements for proposals, and I see no reason why, if we are going to buy motor ambulances, there should not be the same advertisement for bids.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For care, maintenance, and treatment at asylums in Porto Rico of insane soldiers of the Porto Rico Regiment of Infantry, $100.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman of the committee if this is another case of trying to keep the paragraph in the bill?

Mr. KAHN. No.

Mr. JUUL. I notice that in lines 19, 20, and 21 you appropriate $100 for insane soldiers of the Porto Rico regiment. I want to know how many soldiers you can maintain for $100.

Mr. KAHN. There are very few soldiers of the Porto Rico regiment who go insane. That regiment is specifically provided for by law. I think they have only one insane soldier at Porto Rico belonging to that regiment.

Mr. JUUL. How can you maintain one insane soldier for $100?

Mr. KAHN. Because in that part of the world it does not cost as much to maintain them as it does in Washington. We maintain our insane soldiers in this country at the asylum of St. Elizabeths in the District of Columbia. It is very much cheaper for the Government to pay this asylum in Porto Rico $100 for taking care of an insane soldier than to transport him to Washington and put him over at St. Elizabeths.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the bill by striking out the final letter "s" in the word "soldiers," line 20, page 42.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will withdraw his amendment, because by the time the amendment is adopted there may be a second insane soldier.

Mr. JUUL. But the gentleman would not have more than $100 anyway. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Equipment and maintenance of the Engineer School, including purchase and repair of instruments, machinery, implements, models, and materials for the use of the school and for instruction of engineer troops in their special duties as sappers and miners; for land mining, pontoniering, and signaling; for purchase and binding of professional works and periodicals of recent date treating on military and civil engineering and kindred scientific subjects for the library of the United States Engineers' School; for incidental expenses of the school, including chemicals, stationery, hardware, machinery, and boats; for pay of civilian clerks, draftsmen, electricians, mechanics, and laborers; compensation of civilian lecturers and payment of tuition fees of student officers at civil technical institutions; for unforeseen expenses; for travel expenses of officers on journeys approved by the Secretary of War and made for the purpose of instruction: Provided, That the traveling expenses herein provided for shall be in lieu of mileage and other allowances; and to provide means for the theoretical and practical instruction at the Engineer School by the purchase of textbooks, books of reference, scientific and professional papers, and for other absolutely necessary expenses, $50,000.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 43, line 19, strike out the word "engineers" and insert the word "engineer."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the execution of topographic or other surveys, the securing of such extra topographic data as may be required, and the preparation and printing of maps required for military purposes, to be immediately available and remain available until December 31, 1920: Provided, That the Secretary of War is authorized to secure the assistance, wherever practicable, of the United States Geological Survey, the Coast and Geodetic Survey, or other mapping agencies of the Government in this work and to allot funds therefor to them from this appropriation, $200,000.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This matter of military surveys and maps is one of great importance to this country. My impression is that we are further behind in that regard than any other of the great progressive countries of the world. While in Europe recently the members of the Committee on Military Affairs were given copies of the military maps used in European countries. I dare say that every one of the members was able to orient himself by means of the map and find his way in any direction by following the directions on the map.

There are a few portions of our own country that have been fairly well plotted in that regard. But the great area of the southern part of the country especially has had little mapping of that kind. Several years ago the Engineer Department began this work. It has been very beneficial, and I thought I would take this opportunity to explain the need of it to the members of the committee.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. I wish to ask the gentleman in regard to this $2,000,000 appropriation. I desire to ask whether any part of that is to be used for maps. It is the last item in the paragraph, "maps, War Department."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the Chief of Engineers came to the committee and asked for something like $30,000,000 for that item. It seems that in the operations in the field in Europe there was a great deal of work to be done by the Engineer Department during the present fiscal year. It developed that $28,000,000 of the $30,000,000 has already been expended in this work. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, Mr. Sherley, in the last session of the last Congress, came to the House and told the House that many departments had a great deal more money than they could possibly spend, consequently a bill was brought in to cover back into the Treasury large sums of money. It developed that the committee covered back into the Treasury the $28,000,000 that was needed for the work that was performed in France by the Engineers. The Committee on Military Affairs felt that it was a deficiency and not an item to go into this bill for the fiscal year 1920. So the committee reduced the amount to $2,000,000, which is about the sum that will be required during the next fiscal year for the work done under this item of engineer operations in the field. I understand that it does not have anything to do with maps.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the motion to strike out the last word of this paragraph. This is one of the items in this bill in which I have always felt a very deep and sincere interest—the making of better military maps of this country. As suggested by the gentleman from California, we have over a part of this country a good topographical survey map made by the Geological Survey. A large portion of the eastern part of the country has been covered, although not all, even of New England, has been mapped, and there is a considerable part of the south Atlantic seaboard that has not been mapped. There is a large portion of the whole country not yet mapped; and it seems to me that a great country like this that has no war map of the country should attempt to have one. If we had a war, in some parts of the United States we would not have a single decent map upon which we could base our military map. After completing the foundation map, which is made by the Geological Survey, there is, of course, considerable military information that should be added, much of which is very interesting to people generally, in addition to its value for strictly military uses. I see here an appropriation of $200,000, and it is proposed that a portion of that shall be allotted to the Geological Survey to assist them in going on with that survey. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the Geological Survey ought to go on with mapping the country, without regard to the Military Establishment; that as soon as that foundation map is made it should be taken advantage of by the military authorities and made into a proper military map of the United States.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I would like to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to this. The language of the bill, page 45, line 13, is:

That the Secretary of War is authorized to secure the assistance, wherever practicable, of the United States Geological Survey, the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and other mapping agencies of the Government in this work—

And so forth.

Mr. Chairman, for what particular department are these organizations working if it becomes necessary to state in a bill that the Secretary of War is authorized to secure the assistance? Are not these departments working for all branches of the United States Government? And why should it be necessary to legislate and authorize some officer of the Government to ask these gentlemen to furnish what they ought to furnish without legislation of this sort?

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the reason of that language is this: The Geological Survey and the Coast and Geodetic Survey are both bureaus of the Interior Department. Each of those bureaus performs a certain work in connection with the land areas and the water areas of this country. Each of those bureaus issues maps covering their particular work. It is very valuable information, and these maps are sought by the citizens of this country. Now, instead of making a third map covering all this detail information which the Geological Survey and the Coast and Geodetic Survey show upon their maps, the War Department takes those maps and superimposes upon them the additional information gathered by the War Department officers and they have a complete map showing geological information, coast and geodetic information, and military information in the one map.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman stated that the Coast Survey was part of the Interior Department. I think it is under the Department of Commerce. The Geological Survey is under the Interior Department.

Mr. KAHN. It has been transferred to the Department of Commerce since that was made a separate department. The gentleman is quite correct, and I thank him.

Mr. JUUL. Does not the chairman think that a great saving would be effected and a lot of confusion avoided if all the mapping departments were consolidated and placed under one head?

Mr. KAHN. My experience in this matter has taught me to believe that there will be such an amount of overhead charge if we were to establish a new bureau that it would cost the Government more for the overhead charge than what the three bureaus cost the Government now.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the current expenses of the Ordnance Department in connection with purchasing, receiving, storing, and issuing ordnance and ordnance stores, comprising police and office duties, rents, tolls, fuel, light, water, and advertising, stationery, typewriters, and adding machines, including their exchange, and office furniture, tools, and instruments of service; for incidental expenses of the Ordnance Service, and those attending practical trials and tests of ordnance, small arms, and other ordnance stores; for publications for libraries of the Ordnance Department, including the Ordnance Office; subscriptions to periodicals, which may be paid for in advance; and payment for mechanical labor in the office of the Chief of Ordnance; and for purchase, maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-propelled or horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles, $5,000,000.

Mr. KAHN. I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 46, line 13, after the figures "$5,000,000," add:

"Provided, That all material purchased under the appropriations for the Ordnance Department in this act shall be of American manufacture, except in cases when, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, it is to the manifest interest of the United States to make such purchases abroad, which material shall be admitted free of duty:

"Provided, That the Chief of Ordnance of the United States Army is authorized to employ in the District of Columbia, out of the appropriations made in this act for designing, procuring, caring for, and supplying ordnance and ordnance stores to the Army, such services, other than clerical, as are necessary for carrying out these purposes:

"Provided, That the appropriations hereinbefore made under the heading 'Ordnance Department' shall be available for the payment of an allowance not to exceed $4 per day in lieu of subsistence to civilian employees of the Ordnance Department traveling on official business outside of the District of Columbia and away from their designated posts of duty."

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, this item has heretofore been carried in the appropriation bill. It was in the bill last year, and inadvertently was left out of the committee print this year.

Mr. DENT. Is it in identically the same language?

Mr. KAHN. I believe it is.

Mr. DENT. Then I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama withdraws the point of order. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I wish to ask the chairman of the committee whether under this item there is any part of the appropriation to be expended for the storage of ordnance; for instance, the heavy guns?

Mr. KAHN. I understand that is the purpose of the item. I understand that the officers of the Ordnance Department are now greasing the guns and also the rifles in order to put them into storage. And this money is intended in part for that purpose.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, this is one of the most important items of the bill, if that is the purpose of it. As is well known, at the beginning of this war we had so few guns—by which I mean cannon—that we abandoned practically all of our types and started in making new ones.

In other words, we abandoned our old 3-inch gun and our 6-inch gun and adopted the 75 millimeter and the 155 millimeter, used by the French, to take their places. After some considerable difficulties in attempting to make those two pieces, we finally got under way and succeeded in getting quite a number of guns ready for action about the time the war closed. Since that time—I mean since the armistice was signed—we have finished more of them, and are still finishing, as we ought to do, a considerable number of these guns.

It is well known that the 75-millimeter gun, which is really the backbone of the artillery program, is a gun with a very fine recoil system. We wasted considerable time in trying to make it by American processes after the gun was brought over to us, but we finally had to go to the French method and make it in the same way they make it, which was a very expensive proposition for us. However, we had to have the guns, so went ahead and made them.

In the recoil of that gun there is one part of such a highly polished character that the very faintest trace of dust or anything else on it will entirely spoil it. It must be kept air-tight, as we say, in order to make it of any use. There are a series of fine washers, one of them a silver washer, in order to protect the recoil mechanism. A gun of that kind, with such an arrangement in it, is a very important matter. It is going to give us some labor, some care, and considerable expense to properly keep these guns. I believe that they can be covered with cosmoline, or some other form of oil, and put into such a condition that they will last indefinitely without deterioration. My point is that, having made those guns at great expense, and fine guns they are, which ought to last us for years, longer than any of us here are living, we ought to take care and precaution to see that they are properly stored and taken care of. They are not only of the right kind, but there are a sufficient number of them, which is a good deal for me to say, because I have been speaking for many years for more artillery. We have a sufficient number of those guns, either made or in process of completion, now to serve us for many years to come. The only problem, so far as these particular forms of ordnance are concerned, is to properly store and take care of them. If that is what this item is for, it is a meritorious one, and I hope too much of it will not be used for some other purpose.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I notice in lines 11, 12, and 13 an appropriation of $5,000,000 can be used in buying automobiles for the Army. Of course, other things are mentioned in the item, but there is no limitation on the authority of the Secretary, and he could continue, as he has done in years past, to provide an automobile for every officer in the Army, down to every little lieutenant. I understood that the committee, following the action of the House at the last session, would correct the trouble that was so flagrant previous to this time, and so frame the bill that no money would be available for the purchase of these passenger automobiles for the officers of the Army. Here we see that there is $5,000,000, any part of which can be used for that purpose. I would like to have something from the chairman of the committee on that.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, it developed in the hearing that the War Department has all the motor-propelled vehicles that may be required for passenger carriage, and also for the ordinary uses for which motor trucks are required. But in this particular item, the Ordnance Service, it becomes necessary to provide traction cars which are motor propelled for drawing the very heavy pieces of ordnance. It is a part of the equipment of the ordnance at this time. Many of the large guns of the Army were drawn by so-called caterpillar tractors in the areas which our Army occupied in France. I take it that it is only intended to keep on experimenting with various types of these vehicles, so as to get the most effective ones for our Army that it is possible to procure.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will the gentleman from Michigan yield to permit me to ask a question of the chairman?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The gentleman is well informed, of course; but he must know that it is under this item that the Secretary of War has purchased, or has permitted the purchase of, passenger-carrying vehicles—automobiles—for the officers of the Army for use around the city of Washington. What he says about these motors for drawing ordnance and guns, and all that, has no relation whatever to my inquiry.

Mr. KAHN. Oh, I think the gentleman is mistaken. Most of the motor cars used here in the city of Washington, and probably all of them, are Quartermaster Department cars, and are not Ordnance Department cars.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Michigan yield for a question?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I want to direct the attention of the gentleman from Michigan and that of the chairman of the committee to the fact that the words "passenger-carrying vehicles" are expressly used here.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. That is the matter I called to the gentleman's attention.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. That is not the character of vehicle to which the gentleman from California is referring.

Mr. KAHN. I want to say to the gentleman that this is the situation with reference to the Ordnance Department: The gentleman knows that the department operates the seacoast defenses, the large guns which protect our coast. Many of the forts are away from the cities in rather isolated places. There are in some places no good roads where you can get to the fortifications. Perhaps you have to go there with a horse and carriage. I take it that the vehicles which they have sometimes wear out, and sometimes they have to buy a new vehicle. I take it that that language in the bill is for the purpose of permitting the department to secure occasionally one of these vehicles. Besides, the Ordnance Department operates the pontoon boats of the Army. These have to be carted on horse-drawn vehicles.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I would respectfully say, in answer to what the chairman has said, that he is again evading the issue. Under this appropriation, as I understand and as we were told distinctly at the last session, the Secretary of War buys, or has permitted others to buy, all these numerous passenger automobiles—a very large number—for the use of the officers of the Army, so many of them, and used in such a way that it was a scandal. Everybody recognized it as such, and the House at the last session, when considering the last Army bill, adopted an amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] forbidding the use of the money for that purpose. Here is the money now that can be used for the same purpose. An amendment similar to the provision in the amendment offered at the last session, making impossible the continuance of that scandal, ought to be offered now.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I still insist that the money for automobiles was expended by the Quartermaster Department and not by the Ordnance Department.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman point out where in the bill money is carried for any such purpose as this in the Quartermaster Department?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, it is not in the bill at the present time, but those automobiles which are used by the War Department here in Washington bear the inscription "Quartermaster Department." Any man who will take the trouble to look at them will see the initials "Q. M. C." or the words "Quartermaster Department."

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pay of National Guard (armory drill), $5,000,000.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a few words, nearing the close of the consideration of this bill, in commendation, first, of the action of the Committee on Military Affairs in bringing in here a unanimous report and cutting down the appropriations $400,000,000 and doing so without friction and with good reasons for every reduction and with the entire approval of the committee.

I know it has been said that when the war ended, when the period of the universal support for the prosecution of the war should cease, when the time should come when it was not a patriotic duty to put beneath us partisan interests, when that time should come immediately we would enter upon a factional era of passionate discussion on political issues. I am very glad to notice that in these bills that have already been considered in the House, and in the Senate as well, there is the same anxiety, the same feeling of responsibility that existed during the war to bring the country back to a peace basis that existed during the continuance of the war. In other words, the patriotism of peace seems to be greater than factional interests in the House and in the Senate, and I desire to call the attention of Congress and of the people to this fact and to hope that it may continue during our further deliberations.

I think we are probably not really aware of the remarkable progress that we are making in the demobilization of the Army and the advances toward a peace basis. I have no hesitancy to say that the record of the War Department in the demobilization of soldiers and in the return from France to America of the soldiers that we sent over there during the past few months has been a remarkable record, commendable in every degree. [Applause.]

I do not hesitate, and I am glad to give my commendation to the administration in its work. When this month we shall bring back from France 375,000 of our soldiers across the sea 3,000 and more miles away, and shall demobilize them almost instantly when they arrive on our shores, I believe it is an achievement of its kind that has never been equaled before in all the history of the world. [Applause.] I think it is only just that we should say that. I sincerely hope that it may go on.

I want to say also this: I presume there has been no history written of the Civil War that has not mentioned, as a remarkable incident in connection with it, the rapidity with which the soldiers of the Civil War drifted back and were absorbed into the citizen life of the Nation, quickly and with little difficulty and trouble. There is nothing perhaps that has so excited the admiration of Europeans, who have commented upon that war and its results as the fact that 2,000,000 men in arms, many of them having been four years under arms, with all the ambitions and passions of a long fratricidal war, suddenly were disarmed and sent back to their homes, and in a very few months were absorbed into the citizen life of the country with hardly a ripple on the surface to disturb the body politic. I think, notwithstanding the sensational statements of the newspapers, who try to imagine that we are going to have serious conditions in this country regarding our demobilization, and that the passions of war will be carried out into uneasiness and disorder in the community, that when the record of this war——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

By unanimous consent the time of Mr. TOWNER was extended five minutes.

Mr. TOWNER. I believe that a like record will be made with regard to this war. I have been astonished as I have learned of the absorption of the troops into civil life in my own State. I have asked as to whether or not there was any disorder. No disorder was reported. I have asked, "Are there men seeking employment?" "There is employment enough for every man who asks for it." And I find in this country to-day, when you come to examine the situation carefully, there is a place in civil life, there is employment in civil life for every soldier who desires to find such employment. [Applause.]

I am very glad indeed that such conditions exist. Thankful should we be certainly as American citizens and as Representatives of the American Congress when under these conditions, going through the awful disorders that have come to this world because of this war, that we shall find in a few years that the burdens that we have to carry are after all only economic and financial burdens, that the memories that now cause pain will gradually die out, that the wonderful prosperity that will come to this country following this war will be such as to carry our Nation forward at such an accelerated rate that we will hardly realize that a war existed, even in economical and financial matters. I believe we have nothing to fear from the future. I think Members of Congress should look into it not only with hope, but with an earnest desire to see that we shall do everything within our power to make the years that are to come so glorious in prosperity and in the advancement that this country will give to the civilization and to the happiness of the world that we will soon blot out the memories and the heartburnings and the pain of those sacrifices that we have made during these years of warfare. [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I do not wish to offer any criticism of the magnificent service of the soldiers of the United States, and there is nothing but commendation that should be said of the individual and collective efforts of the Army of the United States in this World War. But I do think, now that this war is over, that there is one thing we should bear in mind when we come to the reorganization of the Army and to the reorganization of the plans for the conduct of our military affairs. I hope there will never be a repetition of this World War, but I have my doubt upon that proposition and believe that as long as the human race exists there will continue to be wars. I have special reference to the monstrous action of the courts-martial during this present war, which have been indefensible, barbaric, and without excuse in many instances. I had called to my attention to-day a case—and there are many just like it, I dare say—that would almost melt a heart of stone.

There was a young man in the northern part of Indiana, in my district, who went away and joined the colors a few days before he was 18 years of age, fabricating a little in order to get in. He went through the training camps here, went over on the other side, and was engaged on six of the great battle fronts, including Chateau-Thierry, Verdun, Belleau Wood, and three others. After all these serious engagements his division was taking a much needed rest.

He and another boy thought that possibly they could improve their opportunity, without any great detriment to the Army, so slipped away one day to go and see Paris, without any thought of desertion in their minds. After they had gotten away they stopped at a wine shop and drank a little wine. There they changed their clothes for citizens' clothes in order that they might not be detected. Their purpose was to go and see Paris. On their way, perhaps under the influence of this wine, they concluded that after having seen Paris they would go down to Brest and, if possible, would get onto a ship, stow away, come home and see their fathers and mothers, and go back and join their regiment again. That is the evidence as disclosed in this case, and it is undisputed. Notwithstanding that fact, notwithstanding the fact that they had rendered this valiant service on these six battle fronts, each one of these boys was charged with being a deserter, when it never was in their minds to desert, and they were each sentenced to a military prison for 20 years.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Not now.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Not now. It is fair to say that this sentence was commuted to three years. These boys were sent to Leavenworth. There the one whom I have in mind, and in whom I was interested, was taken with appendicitis, from which he died. He sent for his mother, the one to whom a boy always turns when faced with death. His mother felt the disgrace. She wanted the boy to tell her the exact truth about the whole matter, and with his dying lips he told her the same story I have told you now.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman, of course, presents a clear case of desertion. Does he defend it?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I would not defend it, but it is not a clear case of desertion. It is only technical, and very technical desertion at most.

Mr. LEVER. Suppose the whole Army had done that?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Well, if the whole Army had done it there would have been some conspiracy which prompted that action, but I do say that in order to be a criminal there must be criminal intent. These boys were only gone for 24 hours. They were picked up by some French gendarmes before they had gotten 10 miles away from their command. There was no criminal intent in this case. There was no design on the part of these young men to be deserters. The worst that could be said is they were absent without leave.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman is a fine lawyer, and the gentleman knows that the intent is fixed by circumstances.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That depends on the character of the act. I say there is not a civil court in the land but what would have taken into consideration the circumstances of the case, together with the previous conduct and habits and services of these boys. There is not a civil court in the land under the evidence presented by the prosecution in this case that would have convicted them of this major offense. There is not a military court in the land that can successfully contend that these boys had an intent to desert or that they ever formed the design to desert.

Mr. PELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. PELL. Does the gentleman mean to say that this boy, being in the Army for six months, having fought for some period, having had this military training, did not know that to leave his post, get drunk, change his clothes, and conceal himself was a serious military offense? Should he have been in an insane asylum or in a jail? [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I am surprised that any man in this House has not enough of the milk of human kindness in his heart and enough of gray matter in his head to discern the difference between the acts of these boys, immature as they were, and the acts of a willful deserter. Of course they knew that they were committing a violation of military regulations, but they did not suppose that they were committing a crime, and under the law and the facts they were not committing the crime of desertion. My sole purpose in speaking of this incident is to call attention to the archaic and barbaric court-martial system of ours, that is not only a disgrace to our Army but a disgrace to our boasted civilization.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. LEVER. I ask that the gentleman have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana desire more time?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; I have said all that I care to.

The Clerk read as follows:

AUTOMATIC MACHINE RIFLES.

For the purchase, manufacture, test, repair, and maintenance of automatic machine rifles, or other automatic or semiautomatic guns, including their mounts, sights, and equipments, and the machinery necessary for their manufacture, $1,500,000.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The Ordnance Department must have an enormous number of these guns on hand already.

Mr. KAHN. Not as large a number as the gentleman imagines. Of course, the care and maintenance of those we have is a very important matter. And then, too, the Ordnance Department will continue to manufacture those guns that are required for the strength of the Army that we will need when we get down on a peace-time basis.

It developed in this war, I will say to the gentleman, that there is no piece of ordnance that is so very important as the machine gun. Every army in the future, in my humble opinion, will have to have a greater number of light and heavy machine guns than have been utilized heretofore. As I now recall, the Ordnance Department asked for a much larger sum than we are giving them. I think they ask for $3,000,000, but the committee felt that they would have to worry along for the fiscal year 1920 with one million and a half.

I think every dollar of that amount will be used, and used to good advantage, for the purposes needed.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I was one of the strong supporters of the gentleman from California in trying to get an appropriation for machine guns early enough to be of some use during the war. We were resisted at every stage. Finally the appropriation was made, but at a time when it was impossible to get the guns until the war was nearly over. Now we have an enormous number, and I should not suppose it was necessary to go on and manufacture them for our little Army for some time to come.

Mr. KAHN. They delivered 318,372 machine guns. But, as the gentleman is aware, in actual warfare many of them are destroyed and others injured. I do not suppose the department has many more than a hundred thousand at this time.

Mr. PLATT. If we are going to have an Army as low as the appropriations adopted yesterday would indicate, that would be one to every three men.

Mr. KAHN. The appropriation, of course, indicates an Army of 225,000 men eventually, but in the use of these guns, as I say, many of them are injured and many are destroyed.

Mr. PLATT. Not in time of peace.

Mr. KAHN. Even in time of peace. They are in use constantly. The National Guard will have to be equipped also. There is not a country in the world that uses as much ammunition as we do in practice, and during the practice these guns are frequently destroyed. The life of any gun is not as great as the gentleman probably imagines. This war developed that every soldier in the field used approximately three rifles a year during the war.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. TILSON. As a matter of fact, is not a large part of the appropriation for the development and manufacture of 50-caliber guns, which we lacked. We had a number of light and heavy type, and I think will have a good supply, but we were weak in the larger caliber gun, which was used successfully by Germany and which was thought to be a very valuable gun against tanks and machine-gun nests.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. PLATT. I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PLATT. Now I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. TILSON. The idea is to finish developing the gun, which was practically complete at the time of the armistice. As I understand the purpose of this appropriation, it is to complete the development, to prepare for manufacturing, and to manufacture a number of these 50-caliber guns. They are of a type that proved quite useful in the war, and especially useful against tanks and against machine-gun nests.

Mr. KAHN. We were using the 37-millimeter small gun for that purpose. As the gentleman from Connecticut has stated, we had no guns of the 50-caliber type, and it is desirable to make some experiments in that direction.

Mr. TILSON. Of course, the 37-millimeter gun is entirely too large for many of the purposes for which this gun is to be used. Among other things, it is intended to use these guns on aeroplanes. They will probably be found very useful for aeroplane fighting.

Mr. KAHN. The 37-millimeter cannon we had, though, did very effective work in the Argonne in cleaning up German machine-gun nests.

Mr. PLATT. If I may ask the gentleman one more question, and that is whether the league of nations has not forbidden the use of tanks and things of that sort?

Mr. KAHN. That is in the next item.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Purchase of horses for mounted units, $1,000,000.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. With regard to the paragraph just read I want to offer a pro forma amendment, and I do not know whether I should do it now or wait until we conclude the reading under the head of the National Guard.

The CHAIRMAN. It was stated by the chairman of the committee that he desired that subheads be considered rather than paragraphs in the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Then I move to strike out the last word of that paragraph. I beg the Chair's pardon, I did not understand the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment would be in order at the conclusion of the reading of the subhead of which each paragraph is being read.

Mr. KAHN. Of course, that rule that was made in the House on a former occasion applies to those paragraphs that do not contain sums of appropriation. It would be in order after a sum is read on any of these appropriations to move to amend the change of sum.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from Texas is in order.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I make that motion for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee for some information, if I may have the attention of the chairman. I observe here in line 18 the item carries a provision for the purchase of horses for the National Guard, $1,000,000. On page 31 there is a provision for the purchase of horses for the Regular Army, and there you safeguard, or undertake to safeguard, the purchase of those horses, providing how and under what conditions they may be purchased. I want to ascertain from the chairman why the committee has not thrown the same safeguards around this item of purchase?

Mr. KAHN. The National Guard, of course, has never bought polo ponies, and I assume that it does not buy——

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The provision with regard to polo ponies, if I may interrupt the chairman, is a very small part of the safeguard you undertake to throw around the provision authorizing the purchases of horses for the Regular Army, if the chairman will refer to the item.

Mr. KAHN. I thought the safeguard referred to polo ponies and undersized horses.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. If the chairman of the committee will permit, I will read the language. It provides that—no part of this appropriation shall be paid out for horses not purchased by contract after competition duly invited by the Quartermaster Corps and an inspection under the direction and authority of the Secretary of War. When practicable, horses shall be purchased in open market—

And so forth.

Nothing of that kind is provided with reference to this item, and I wanted to know why.

Mr. KAHN. All the horses for the National Guard, as well as for the Regular Establishment, are purchased by the War Department. I have no objection to this proviso going into the bill. It has not been in it heretofore. So far as the present chairman of the committee is concerned, he does not object to such a proviso.

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. DENT. I do not think that we should observe the same strict rules and regulations in the purchase of horses for the National Guard that we would for the Artillery and Cavalry in the Regular Army, and that is the reason that is not contained in the National Guard provision. The horses we purchase for the National Guard are merely for a certain amount of temporary training, and the same regulations are not necessary as to the character of the horses and size of the horses. There are things connected with horses that you would need for the Artillery and Cavalry service in the Regular Army that are not with horses for the National Guard. I think that is the reason.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. May I ask this question? Now, if it is necessary to provide that horses for the Regular Army are to be bought upon a competitive basis, why is it not advisable to have the same provision with regard to the purchase of those horses? It seems clear to me the restrictions and directions ought either to be in both places or in neither.

Mr. DENT. I thought the gentleman was referring to that part of the proviso, which I understood him to read, that no part of this appropriation shall be expended for horses below the standard set by Army regulations.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Oh, no. I read the language a moment ago, and I will read it again:

No part of this appropriation shall be paid out for horses not purchased by contract after competition duly invited by the Quartermaster Corps and an inspection under the direction and authority of the Secretary of War. When practicable, horses shall be purchased in open market—

And so forth.

With regard to this last item there is no provision in regard to purchase in the open market and no provision with reference to purchase upon competitive bidding.

Mr. DENT. I thought the gentleman was referring to this proviso to which I called attention; I have no objection.

Mr. KAHN. Of course the gentleman understands that when horses are bought for the Army they are bought all over the country, and then they are sent to some remount station for maintenance and keep.

The horses for the National Guard, I understand, are purchased in the State where the guard has its existence.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] stated, as I recall, that the same requirements are not necessary for the National Guard horses. Of course most of the horses required for the National Guard are for those officers who, under the law, are required to be mounted, whereas the horses for the Regular Army are principally Cavalry and Artillery horses that must be carefully selected.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. If the chairman will permit me, I want to direct the Committee on Military Affairs to what seems to me to be an unwise method of purchasing horses, especially for the Army service, and I would like to have the attention of the chairman of the committee, as I have made some investigation of this matter.

Under the present system of purchases there intervenes between the men who raise the horses and the Government which uses the horses, one, two, and sometimes three contracts, each of whom gets his rake-off for a service that ought not to be interposed. It is important that the Government have the right sort of horses bred for its use, but the price which those get who do the work is not sufficient to induce them to raise the proper horses. And instead of provisions, which have been referred to, it would be common sense to give notice, for instance, in horse-breeding centers that on certain days a man for the Government would be there to inspect these horses and to purchase them from the men who raise them. We have been doing this, I think we do now, namely, we advertise for bids. Some one who never raised a horse in his life bids on the contract, and then he finds a lot of subcontractors, Tom, Dick, and Harry, throughout the country, who gather the horses for him. I know it to be a fact that the Government has paid as much as $150 for a horse when the man who raised the horse got but $75 for it. That is absurd. It is not practical for individual growers to bid on these contracts, and everybody knows it. Here is one service that the Government ought to perform and not depend upon these intermediaries, and I beg the gentlemen who constitute the Committee on Military Affairs to bring pressure to bear on the Government to change its policy in order that it may offer the highest inducement to the men upon whom the Government is depending to raise horses that are to carry its soldiers into battle. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Travel of Federal officers and noncommissioned officer on visits of instruction, $40,000.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KAHN: Page 49, line 9, strike out the last word, "officer," and insert in lieu thereof the word "officers."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Travel of Federal officers and noncommissioned officers connected with camps of instruction, $10,000.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee what is the difference between this item and the one just read. It says:

Travel of Federal officers and noncommissioned officers connected with camps of instruction, $10,000.

The other item reads:

Travel of Federal officers and noncommissioned officers on visits of instruction, $40,000.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, as I recall, the national-defense act provides that there shall be officers and noncommissioned officers stationed at the camps of instruction who shall give instruction at those camps. The other item provides for the inspection of the camp by officers and noncommissioned officers who go there especially to inspect the camps. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO], who takes a particular interest in the National Guard items, can probably enlighten the gentleman from Kentucky more fully.

Mr. CRAGO. The larger item is for the pay of officers and noncommissioned officers in making their annual trips of inspection around the home companies of the different organizations of the National Guard, scattered all over the United States, and the smaller item is for the expense of officers and men at the instruction camp in the different States.

Mr. BARKLEY. One is to pay their way in going from place to place and the other is to pay expenses while they are there?

Mr. CRAGO. There is the annual spring inspection, to which an officer is detailed to go and make the inspection, but in the summer instruction camps these men are sent to the camps of instruction for the purpose of giving instruction.

Mr. BARKLEY. I withdraw the pro forma amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The Clerk read as follows:

Inspection of material, Field Artillery, Coast Artillery, and Signal Corps, $2,500.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I ask the attention of the chairman of the committee. I desire to direct the attention of the chairman to what I believe to be a mistake which I discovered in the investigation of the provisions of the bill to which I addressed myself a moment ago. On page 31, at the bottom of the page, the language is:

When practicable, horses shall be purchased in open market at all military posts or stations, when needed, at a maximum price to be fixed by the Secretary of War.

It seems to me that the language should be "within or not to exceed the maximum price." As I understand it, the purpose is that the purchase price shall not exceed the maximum price, but may be as much lower than the maximum price as it can be made. I direct the attention of the chairman, so that he may examine the language of that portion of the bill.

Mr. KAHN. Probably it is as the gentleman says. The trouble with these various items is this: They are used in one appropriation bill after another for many years, and in that way a matter such as the gentleman has called attention to is overlooked.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I merely direct the gentleman's attention to it.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think it is overlooked. I think the language is all right as it is. This provides that a maximum price to be fixed by the Secretary of War. Now, the Secretary of War says to the man who buys the horses, "You can not buy them at a higher price than the price I fix." That is a given sum.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. No; the language is that purchases shall be made at the maximum price, while the purpose is that they shall be made within the maximum price. The language is not correct, and the chairman will so determine when he examines it, and I am sure will make the proper correction. Therefore I shall not take the time of the committee to present the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of War is hereby authorized to issue from surplus stores now on hand and purchased for the United States Army such articles of clothing and equipment matériel as may be needed by the National Guard organized under the provisions of the act of June 3, 1916, which law is still in force and applicable to State forces. This issue will be made without charge against militia appropriations and will be reimbursed in kind for all Federal property brought into service by State troops. Issue will be made as soon as the provisions of act of June 3, 1916, shall have been fulfilled: Provided, That the provisions of section 62, act of June 3, 1916, will be considered fulfilled if the first strength mentioned therein be attained by June 30, 1919, and the other increments provided therein be attained by successive years thereafter: Provided further, That this will not prevent any State from compliance with the provisions of section 62 as now worded: Provided further, That the appropriations and provisions of this act referring to the National Guard become applicable and available upon the date this becomes a law.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KAHN: Page 50, line 6, strike out the words "June 30" and insert in lieu thereof the words "December 31."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the amendment is this: June 30 is almost at hand, and it will not be possible to organize the National Guard of the United States within the two or three weeks remaining. Therefore, it has been suggested that the date be changed to December 31.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SANFORD: Page 50, line 12, after the word "law," insert the following:

"That section 69 of the act of June 3, 1916, be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 69. Enlistments in the National Guard: Hereafter the period of enlistment in the National Guard shall be the same as is, or may be, prescribed by the Regular Army: Provided, That all persons who have served as enlisted men in the Army of the United States, or the Organized Militia of the several States, subsequent to April 6, 1917, and who have been honorably discharged from such service, may within six months of such discharge or within six months after the passage of this act, enlist in the National Guard for a period of one year and may reenlist for like periods, and that such enlistments shall not be counted in computing the proportion authorized to be enlisted for one year to conform to the period of enlistment prescribed for the Regular Army: Provided further, That enlisted men in the National Guard of the several States now serving under contracts providing for a six-year period of enlistment—three years in an active organization and the remaining three years in the National Guard Reserve—shall be afforded an opportunity to enlist for the periods specified above, and upon entering into a new contract of enlistment for a period of three years under this authority shall be given credit for the period served under the old enlistment contract.'"

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that. I would like to hear some explanation of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California reserves a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, I am confident that the House and the committee will be unanimously in favor of this amendment. I am confident that the chairman of the committee will be persuaded to withdraw the point of order, or not make it, if the House shows some disposition to encourage it.

The committee unanimously agreed not to add legislative features to the bill, and we should not add this one unless the situation was critical. The National Guard finds itself, or will find itself at the close of the emergency, substantially without personnel. The only term of enlistment in the National Guard now is for six years. The men who have been in the Army and who have seen oversea service will not take an oath to serve for six years, and no one could expect them to take such an oath. The men who have served in the different home-guard organizations are not willing to take a six-year oath, and no one would expect them to do so. At the close of the last session of Congress we amended the law with reference to the term of enlistments in the Regular Army, providing that enlistments in the Regular Army may be for one year for one-third of the force and for the remainder of the force for three years.

This amendment which I have offered, although somewhat complicated, and necessarily complicated, does exactly this: It makes the period of enlistment in the National Guard the same as in the Regular Army. The men who have seen oversea service, the men who have served in the home guard, may within six months after the passage of this act, or after their discharge, enlist for one year; otherwise enlistments in the National Guard must be for three years.

This amendment also would strike out all provision for reserves in the National Guard, just as we have already stricken out all provision for reserves in the Regular Army. I can say to you with confidence that the members of the committee who have given this subject their attention all favor the amendment. The National Guard authorities of my State—and I am informed, in fact, of all the other States—favor the enactment of a law similar to that contained in this amendment.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. SANFORD. Gladly.

Mr. KAHN. I would like the gentleman to explain the last proviso in his amendment, which reads:

Provided further, That enlisted men in the National Guard of the several States now serving under contracts providing for a six-year period of enlistment—three years in an active organization and the remaining three years in the National Guard Reserve—shall be afforded an opportunity to enlist for the periods specified above, and upon entering into a new contract of enlistment for a period of three years under this authority shall be given credit for the period served under the old enlistment contract.

Mr. SANFORD. I personally feel that that provision will not have much, if any, application, because I believe that there will be no personnel whatever in the National Guard to whom it will apply. But the amendment I have offered has the approval of the Militia Bureau and other people who have studied it. If there is any one in the National Guard to whom it applies, he will be relieved and be allowed to make a new enlistment on the new terms and be credited with the term he has already served. If there are none such, it can do no harm.

Mr. KAHN. I am rather doubtful myself about the last proviso. Would the gentleman object to striking that out of the amendment?

Mr. SANFORD. I would be very glad to have the amendment considered and revised and reamended as much as the committee likes. I think the latter portion of the amendment probably will have no effect, because I think that when the emergency is over there will be no personnel in the National Guard except those who have enlisted recently.

Mr. KAHN. If the gentleman will offer his amendment with the last proviso stricken out, I shall not make the point of order.

Mr. SANFORD. I ask unanimous consent to reform my amendment by striking out the last proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to reoffer his amendment without the last proviso. Is there objection?

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD] that the last proviso ought to remain in the amendment. It is probable that no case will exist, but it is also possible that there will be a case which will exist. This will put everybody on an equality. I think the law should be in accordance with the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, and that we should put enlistments in the National Guard on exactly the same basis as enlistments in the Regular Army. I think that ought to be adopted.

Mr. SANFORD. I will say to the gentleman from Alabama that I am agreeable to the suggestion of the gentleman from California only because I am glad to get rid of the point of order. Will the gentleman from California allow my amendment to come before the committee and give the committee a chance to consider it and amend it if it wishes to do so?

Mr. KAHN. I want to say frankly to the gentleman from New York that I should like to study the effect of that last proviso a little more carefully. If it is essential to the bill, I think it can be inserted on the Senate side, and we can come to an agreement on it without any difficulty. But it is a matter I have not been able to study carefully enough, and I hope, therefore, that the gentleman will agree to leave out the proviso.

Mr. DENT. I reserved the right to object. I withdraw the reservation.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know that we ought to take the time now; but it does seem to me that the last proviso can do no harm in any case, and that it might do a lot of good, because it is just possible that a number of men have already enlisted under the six-year enlistment plan in the National Guard at some places.

Mr. SANFORD. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. If they have, this provides for them; and if they have not, it does not matter.

Mr. SANFORD. I am very confident that if the committee now passes on this amendment the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], who will be one of the conferees, will have an opportunity to pass on this particular question; and if he wants this proviso in there, then the House can pass on it later.

Mr. MADDEN. I agree exactly.

Mr. KAHN. I can assure the gentleman——

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman does not have to assure me——

Mr. KAHN. That if it does seem important I shall not oppose it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to offer his amendment without the last proviso. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York as modified.

Mr. KAHN. I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee what is meant by the item in line 19, on page 49—

Pay of National Guard (armory drill), $5,000,000.

Mr. KAHN. Under the national-defense act, as I recall, National Guardsmen are compelled to take 48 drills a year, and possibly 52.

Mr. BEE. Is that in addition to their compensation while in service?

Mr. KAHN. Yes. When they are in the service of course they get the pay of the enlisted men and the officers of the Regular Army, but this is for attending drills while they are acting simply as National Guardsmen.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

RIFLE RANGES FOR CIVILIAN INSTRUCTION.

For arms, ammunition, targets, and other accessories for target practice for issue in connection with the encouragement of rifle practice in pursuance of the provisions of section 113 of the act approved June 3, 1916, $100,000.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KAHN: Page 60, lines 16 and 17, strike out the words "section 113 of the act approved June 3, 1916," and insert in lieu thereof the word "law."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, there are several laws which refer to rifle ranges for civilian instruction. Under the wording of the paragraph in this bill this money could only be used under the provisions of the national-defense act ,and it is desirable to utilize all the laws which apply for this purpose to the National Guard.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

CIVILIAN MILITARY TRAINING CAMPS.

For arms and ordnance equipment, including overhauling and repairing of personal equipments, machine-gun outfits, horse equipment; ammunition, targets, and other accessories for target practice; and for overhauling and repairing arms for issue and use in connection with training camps for civilians in pursuance of the provisions of section 54 of the act approved June 3, 1916, is hereby extended and made available for the fiscal year 1920, $100.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KAHN: Page 50, lines 25 and 26, strike out the words "is hereby extended and made available for the fiscal year 1920."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, of course this appropriation is for the fiscal year 1920, and therefore these words are superfluous.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

RESERVE CORPS.

ORDNANCE STORES, EQUIPMENT, ETC., RESERVE OFFICERS' TRAINING CORPS.

For arms and ordnance equipment, including overhauling and repairing of personal equipments, machine-gun outfits, and horse equipments for use in connection with the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, established by the act approved June 3, 1916, is hereby extended and made available for the fiscal year 1920, $100.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KAHN: Page 51, lines 8 and 9, strike out the words "is hereby extended and made available for the fiscal year 1920."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For arms and ordnance equipment, including overhauling and repairing of personal equipments, machine-gun outfits, and horse equipments for issue to schools and colleges in pursuance of the provisions of section 56 of the act approved June 3, 1916, $100: Provided, That the appropriations herein made for the support of the Army and the National Guard are available for such printing, binding, and blank books as may be necessary in putting in effect the objects of the appropriations: And provided further, That hereafter printing, binding, and blank books required for use outside of the District of Columbia in connection with the support of the Army and the National Guard may be done or procured elsewhere than at the Government Printing Office when in the opinion of the Secretary of War such work can be more advantageously done or procured locally, the cost thereof to be paid from the proper appropriations: And provided further, That no part of any of the appropriations made herein nor any of the unexpended balances of appropriations heretofore made for the support and maintenance of the Army or the Military Establishment shall be expended for the purchase of real estate.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the proviso beginning on line 20, page 51, the second proviso in the paragraph. That provides apparently for permanent law.

Mr. KAHN. I hope the gentleman will reserve his point of order.

Mr. WALSH. I will reserve it.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer an amendment to the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment can not be offered when a point of order is pending.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a point of order against the last proviso.

Mr. MONDELL. The point of order comes too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will protect the rights of Members who wish to make points of order to the several provisos.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I will reserve a point of order against the entire paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina reserves a point of order against the entire paragraph.

Mr. KAHN. I want to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if he would have any objection to the second proviso if I offer an amendment to strike out the word "hereafter"?

Mr. WALSH. No; I would have no objection to it. I will withdraw the point of order reserved to the proviso.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman from California yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts withdraws his reservation of a point of order, and the gentleman from South Carolina reserves a point of order to the whole paragraph.

Mr. KAHN. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. LEVER. The last proviso in this paragraph reads:

That no part of any of the appropriations made herein nor any of the unexpended balances of appropriations heretofore made for the support and maintenance of the Army or the Military Establishment shall be expended for the purchase of real estate.

It has come to my attention that at certain cantonments obligations have been entered into by the Government for the purchase of land, and these people with whom contracts have been made "do not know where they are at." They have moved away from the property, bought other land, or are engaged in other pursuits, and it seems to me that a sufficient authorization or appropriation should be made to take care of those existing contracts. I would like to ask the gentleman from California what the situation is?

Mr. KAHN. The committee felt constrained to offer this proviso because the War Department has been purchasing land for Army posts in various sections of the country, and the committee felt that the Military Establishment owns enough land for all purposes of the Army of the United States. The committee felt that under the circumstances this practice should be discontinued. The appropriations for these purchases, I may say to the gentleman, have not generally been made by the Committee on Military Affairs. They have been made under lump-sum appropriations reported to the House and were passed by the House. The appropriations came from other committees and were necessary probably for the proper conduct of the war. But the Committee on Military Affairs feel that the custom that has prevailed in the last year or two should be stopped and that the further purchase of land should be discontinued by affirmative action on the part of Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inquire of the gentleman from California are there unexpended balances out of appropriations that will be available after July 1 until expended?

Mr. KAHN. My information is that there will be such balances out of appropriations that were made for certain large sums that would be available until the money therein appropriated is expended.

The CHAIRMAN. And that money would be available for the purchase of land affected by this proviso?

Mr. KAHN. That is my understanding of the situation.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman from California will permit, I thoroughly agree with him that until the size of the standing Army of the United States has been agreed upon it is folly, senseless, and asinine to extend the size of the cantonments. I think the committee is thoroughly right in that respect. But where obligations have been incurred, where farmers, for instance, have had their lands taken, their houses razed, forced to move away and buy other property, go into other occupations, it does seem to me that provision might be made here for caring for that kind of a situation. I had in mind to suggest to the gentleman from California the addition of this language: "Except in fulfillment of contracts or obligation." It seems to me that that would take care of the situation and be just to these people.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. LEVER. I will be very glad to do so.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Were these contracts for the purchase of land by the Government, to which the gentleman from South Carolina refers, begun before the armistice or since?

Mr. LEVER. I think some were begun before and some since. I am not sure. I understand the gentleman from California has possibly some communication from the Chief of Staff on this proposition. I have not received that myself.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will not those which were taken before the armistice come under the terms and provisions of this act, by which we sought in reference to those incomplete war claims and incomplete war contracts to validate them? I refer to the act passed at the last session of Congress.

Mr. LEVER. That is likely true, but if there should be other obligations entered into since the armistice there would be no protection of the people——

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If those negotiations were conducted in pursuance of law, then on their face they must be good as damages against the Government up to the point to which this proviso attaches.

Mr. LEVER. I do not see what the objection would be——

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Because it is too comprehensive; it has no limitation at all upon any project which the Government has even just begun, and that is exactly what we want to get at.

Mr. CRAGO. I desire to ask the gentleman if the striking out of the word "unexpended" and substituting the word "unobligated" would not accomplish the purpose?

Mr. LEVER. It would accomplish everything I am looking to and which I think we ought to do as a matter of justice to these people.

Mr. CRAGO. It is only fair and right——

Mr. LEVER. Would the gentleman from California accept the proposition?

Mr. KAHN. Personally I have no objection to making the change.

Mr. DOWELL. In cases where options have been secured on part of the land and not secured upon other parts of the land, what would the gentleman do in such a case as that?

Mr. LEVER. I would say that the option did not apply.

Mr. DOWELL. It would be one part of a camp that would be subject to purchase and the other part would not. It seems to me that that would put you in a very peculiar situation of purchasing a part of a camp and not be able to get another part, perhaps the center of the camp.

Mr. LEVER. I will say this to the gentleman from Iowa: I agree with the chairman of the committee that we ought as quickly as possible determine our policy in reference to the purchase of land for additional Army posts, cantonments, and so forth. I should think myself, without knowing anything of the subject except general knowledge, that you have got enough of these cantonments and camps to take care of a standing Army of a million men. Am I right?

A MEMBER. Five.

Mr. LEVER. It seems to me it is foolhardy and absurd to continue to buy property at exorbitant prices, sometimes, to enlarge these cantonments. The only thing I stand for at all is that where the Government has incurred its obligations and disarranged the status of citizens it ought to make good to those citizens, and if we can do that in this paragraph by virtue of a simple amendment like striking out the word "unexpended" and making it "unobligated," I am perfectly willing to do it.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, it is not the purpose of the Committee on Military Affairs and it is certainly not my purpose in standing for this proposed amendment that we desire to do an injustice to any citizen of this country, and the purpose of this amendment is not that any citizen of the country shall be injured in his rights, but the purpose of this amendment is to protect all the citizens of this country against the policy that has been carried on by the War Department since the armistice was signed. During the war the Congress of the United States very properly turned over to the War Department the administration of everything connected with the War Department necessary in the prosecution of the war—the acquiring of land, the purchase or leasing of lands, and all other activities—found necessary for the carrying on of the war, but it never was the purpose of the Congress of the United States to turn over to a real estate bureau in the War Department the right to go out all over this country and enter upon a debauch of purchasing real estate in every section of the country and making contracts that would bind the people of this country after the war is over. As a matter of fact, since the signing of the armistice, since the War Department knew that the great armies of this country were going to be demobilized and reduced and that we would not have any further need for land or for buildings, the agents of the War Department have gone on buying thousands and thousands of acres of land and contracting with the citizens of the different States to pay for the same. And it was testified to before our committee that they desired to buy large plants for the manufacture of machine guns and other munitions of war and for the storage of property, and unless the Congress of the United States take some steps to prevent it, gentlemen, they will continue to do so. I want to say to you, Mr. Chairman, that I am not in favor of inserting the word "unobligated" in the proposed amendment. If these men without authority of law, without the consent of Congress, have implicated the Government in contracts, thereby undertaking to tie the hands of the taxpayers in order to pay men in Georgia or Connecticut or Illinois for land, and they have said to them, "You can move off this land, we will tear down the buildings and then we will pay you for it," I would stop that payment as far as the purchase of land is concerned and the turning over of the title of the land to this Government, because it does not mean only the price of the land. It means that the War Department will then insist on an organization being set up there to take care of it and make an artillery firing field of it, a small-arms firing field, a flying field, or some other military activity which will require perhaps a regiment of soldiers to care for the same, and to maintain the regiment, battalion, or company, or whatever force may be stationed thereon for all the years to come, and I say, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of this House, let us put our foot down on this thing now and stop it. [Applause.]

And if any citizen has a claim—and there are certainly some who have—if any person has been induced to enter into such contract, let him present his claim to the Congress of the United States, and I for one will be in favor of paying it, but I am also in favor of branding the officer or agent of the United States that would undertake to place that burden upon the taxpayers of this country and let the world know that we have men in this land in the employ of the Government who, without authority of law, without any instruction from Congress, would undertake to tie our hands by making a contract for the purchase of land and then assume Congress would make the appropriations to pay for it and thereby ratify the contract.

Mr. Chairman, I hope that no man—I care not from which section of the country he comes—will stand up in this body at this time and undertake to stop us from putting the brake on such conduct which has been going on since the armistice was signed.

I am for the amendment without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t." Let us insert it in this appropriation bill and stop this needless and useless waste of the public money. [Applause.]

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the proposition, and if the Chair will recognize me for that purpose, I wish to say that it should be inserted before the discussion of the merits or demerits of the proposition.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman will withhold it for five minutes, I would like to say something on this, or will the gentleman agree to withhold it for three minutes?

Mr. CRISP. I will withhold it, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is recognized.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] will not make the point of order for the reason that the War Department not long since transferred the school of rifle practice from Fort Sill, Okla., without any reason on earth, as far as I can see, to a county in the State of Georgia, a county containing only about 180,000 acres of land, 140,000 acres of which the War Department has purchased for this school. And I understand that they are paying the people owning this 140,000 acres of land in this county in Georgia fabulous prices for it. They had all the land they needed in Oklahoma. There was no need to move this school of rifle practice into the State of Georgia. They had more land in Oklahoma than they needed for the purpose. Oklahoma met all the needs of the War Department for this kind of work.

Now, why did the War Department go to Georgia to buy this 140,000 acres of land out of a county containing only 180,000 acres? They have spent more than $7,000,000 on this range, and without any authority of law. It had the money in lump sum. They have taken advantage of the fact that they had it, and they have purchased the land in Georgia and abandoned the land that they owned in Oklahoma. Now, why? That is the question.

I hope the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] will not make the point of order. Some of the land in the county that I have referred to in Georgia is in the process of being purchased. Of course, the purchase is not all complete. And this amendment which is proposed to the bill would probably prevent the completion of the purchase. The point of order will permit the War Department to proceed to the conclusion of the purchase without any limit of expenditure, and thereby, in my judgment, complete a transaction of iniquity by the transfer of the school of rifle practice from a State where they already own the land to another State where it has to be purchased.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. FOSTER. When was this land purchased?

Mr. MADDEN. They are purchasing it now.

Mr. FOSTER. Since the armistice?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, as illuminating the matter under discussion, I submit a letter for reading by the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

CUSSETA, GA., June 5, 1919.

Congressman MONDELL, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MONDELL: I wish to call your attention to the large expenditure of money by the War Department on a military camp down here in Chattahoochee County, Ga., known as Fort Benning.

The War Department on November 2, 1918, filed a petition for condemnation of 130,000 acres of land in Chattahoochee and Muscogee Counties, Ga., for a military reservation.

There lives within this area about 8,000 civilian population. They are taking from Chattahoochee County 72,000 acres of land out of a total of 165,000 acres in the entire county. Chattahoochee County is a small county, with 5,640 population. This camp is taking in about 3,300 of the population, most of whom are opposed to giving up their homes.

In January of this year we succeeded in getting a hearing before the Senate Military Affairs Committee in opposition to this camp. The Senate Military Affairs Committee, after hearing both sides, for and against the camp, passed a resolution disapproving the project. The War Department suspended work, and announced no further work would be done on Fort Benning and that proper steps would be taken to salvage same. Immediately after the adjournment of Congress on March 4 the War Department again began the construction of this camp, and are now very busily engaged in building same, working some 4,000 or 5,000 laborers and spending money in a most lavish and extravagant manner. It strikes me that the War Department is undertaking to build a permanent camp in an illegal and fraudulent way, spending money that was appropriated for camp sites, camps, and cantonments during the war emergency.

The department has succeeded in buying about 30,000 acres of this land at an average cost of $42 per acre. Much of the most expensive land within the area is yet to be purchased or condemned and paid for. For this project to go forward and be completed on the large scale proposed means an expenditure in due time of $75,000,000 or $100,000,000; it also means the complete destruction of Chattahoochee County, Ga.

The total taxable value of the county is $1,400,000. The camp zone takes in $900,000 of this taxable property, leaving only $500,000 with which to maintain the remainder of the county. The camp line comes within one-half mile of Cusseta, Ga., the county site.

Our people are very anxious to have Congress make a thorough investigation of this project, with a view to getting the matter stopped.

The buildings at the camp are of the cheapest and crudest kind, having the appearance of a saw-mill settlement.

We are appealing to you, as the majority floor leader of the Sixty-sixth Congress, for help in this matter, and ask that you bring the project to the attention of the proper committees of Congress and give us relief.

I am coming to Washington soon to see what can be done about the matter. I beg to remain.

Yours, very truly,

C. C. MINTER.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MONDELL. What is the point of order now pending?

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will give me an opportunity, I will state it. I have tried to do it repeatedly, but have been swept off my feet each time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] reserved a point of order and the gentleman from Georgia served notice that he would make the point of order. The point of order has not yet been made.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I will now proceed to give the gentleman from Wyoming the benefit of the point of order that I desire to present to the Chair.

Clause 2 of Rule XXI——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia make the point of order?

Mr. CRISP. Yes, sir. I make the point of order to the last proviso on page 52, providing:

That no part of any of the appropriations made herein nor any of the unexpended balances of appropriations heretofore made for the support and maintenance of the Army or the Military Establishment shall be expended for the purchase of real estate.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] withdraw his reservation of the point of order against the paragraph?

Mr. LEVER. It is not necessary. The gentleman from Georgia makes the point of order.

Mr. CRISP. I make it against the last proviso.

Mr. LEVER. I withdraw it against the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina withdraws the reservation of the point of order against the paragraph.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, the point of order is that under clause 2, Rule XXI, legislation is not in order on a general appropriation bill unless that legislation comes within one of the excepted classes by reducing the amount of money appropriated by the bill, by reducing the salaries of anybody paid for in the bill, or by reducing the number of employees carried in the bill. Clearly the proviso is legislation and does not come within any of these three excepted classes.

Now, I apprehend, Mr. Chairman, it will be contended that the proviso is in order, not as legislation but as a limitation. I am not going into the merits or demerits of the establishment of Fort Benning, Ga., or argue it, because I do not think it appropriate or has anything whatever to do with this point of order. Sufficient to say that I believe the officials of the War Department who have been intrusted with the affairs of the Government in spending colossal sums of money to win this war—and we have won it—are honest men and will perform their functions honestly, and are not common grafters. They are capable and honest men. And let me say, besides, that this project—Fort Bennings—was started before the armistice——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. CRISP. I was coming to that; but I did not think I was digressing, in view of the remarks that others have made in interjecting matters that are not pertinent to the point of order. But if the Chair holds me to a strict accountability, I will confine my remarks to the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is only interested in the point of order.

Mr. CRISP. I will keep the Chair from it only for a moment, but I did want to answer briefly some of the aspersions that have been cast on this project in Georgia, which, let me add, is not in my district, but I will restrain myself.

Now, under the rules, I grant you, Mr. Chairman, this House is clothed with plenary power, and this House can pass legislation expressing its views on any matter; and there is no doubt but that this House, if it desires to do so, can pass a resolution carrying into effect this very proviso. But this House has adopted rules for its procedure, and I apprehend that this body—an orderly body—adopted the rules to be governed by them.

Rules unanimously adopted should be observed in the conduct of the business of this House, and those rules say that on an appropriation bill you can not legislate unless it comes within one of those exceptions mentioned, which this proviso does not.

Now, let us see, Mr. Chairman, if this provision can be held to be in order under the guise of a limitation. I call the attention of the Chairman especially to this part of the proviso: "Nor any of the unexpended balances of appropriations heretofore made." Now, there are appropriations heretofore made, with unexpended balances, with no limitations whatever upon them, with which, under the discretion of the executive department, they can buy land.

Now, what does this provision do? This provision seeks to tie up the money appropriated in this bill. I concede that you can do that. I concede that would be a limitation, and I concede that that would be in order. But when the bill goes further and seeks to put a limitation interfering with the executive discretion, putting legislation upon appropriations heretofore made, it is not a limitation, but is legislation, and is not in order on a general appropriation bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is not a new proposition. I call the Chair's attention to the House Manual, section 825, where you will find this citation:

The limitation must apply solely to the money of the appropriation under consideration and may not be made applicable to money appropriated in other acts—

Citing Hinds' Precedents, volume 4, sections 3927 and 3928. Now I read section 3929 of Hinds' Precedents, volume 4, but I will read before that section 3927. This was prepared by Mr. Asher C. Hinds, who was the best parliamentarian in the United States, and for 20 years served this House as parliamentarian. Section 3927 of Hinds' Precedents says:

A limitation may be attached only to the money of an appropriation under consideration, and may not be made applicable to moneys to be appropriated in other acts.

That is exactly this proposition. Now, I read, Mr. Chairman, section 3928, where this very proposition arose, as to whether a provision in the bill placing a limitation on appropriations made in prior appropriation bills is in order as a limitation. I am very glad to be able to call the attention of this distinguished Chairman to the ruling of that great Chairman who was presiding at that time, the late Vice President James S. Sherman. There was no better Chairman of the Committee of the Whole than Mr. Sherman.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman cite the page of Hinds' Precedents?

Mr. CRISP. It is section 3928, page 623, Volume IV, of Hinds' Precedents. This is a ruling of James S. Sherman, of New York:

The Chair, rather than to rule, desires to make a suggestion. It seems to the Chair perfectly clear that it is in order to put a limitation upon the appropriation contained in this bill only; but this appropriation provides: "Toward the armament and armor," etc., indicating that it is expected that a future appropriation must be necessary in order to complete this armament. And in reference to this future appropriation it is not proper to put a limitation in this bill.

The Chair suggests that if the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Hopkins, would withdraw his point of order the wording might be changed, so that, in line 12, the words "all future" be stricken out, and after the word "armor," in line 13, the words "herein appropriated for" be inserted, and that would bring the provision where it would not be obnoxious to the rule. It would be a limitation upon the appropriation and would be admissible under the rule.

Mr. Hopkins having declined to withdraw the point of order, the Chairman said:

If the gentleman from Illinois declines to withdraw the point of order, the Chair, for the reasons that he has stated, will sustain the point of order.

The reasons stated being that it sought to put a limitation on an appropriation previously made.

The CHAIRMAN. May the Chair inquire of the gentleman from Georgia——

Mr. CRISP. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has read the decision to which the gentleman from Georgia refers. Did not that ruling refer to future legislation rather than to prior acts?

Mr. CRISP. I do not think so, but the principle is the same. It does not make any difference. I will read the provision to which this applied:

Armor and armament: Toward the armament and armor of domestic manufacture for the vessels authorized by the act of July 26, 1894, of the vessels authorized under the act of March 2, 1895, of those authorized by the act of June 10, 1896, of those authorized by the act of March 3, 1897, of those authorized by the act of May 4, 1898, and of those authorized by this act, $4,000,000. In all future contracts for armor for any of the vessels above mentioned the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed to procure armor of the best obtainable quality at an average cost not exceeding $545 a ton of 2,240 pounds, including royalties.

All of those vessels were previously authorized by different acts, but the proposed amendment sought to attach a limitation to those acts, and Chairman Sherman held that it was legislation, because it applied to other authorizations and was not confined strictly to the appropriation in the bill under consideration, and therefore it could not be held in order as a limitation, when in fact it was legislation interfering with the executive discretion, attaching new conditions to laws heretofore made.

The CHAIRMAN. May the Chair call the attention of the gentleman from Georgia to the language of the point of order made in that case?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. On page 623:

Against the last sentence of this paragraph, beginning with the words "in all future contracts," Mr. Albert J. Hopkins, of Illinois, made a point of order.

Mr. CRISP. And may I call the attention of the Chair to the suggestion of Mr. Chairman Sherman, to strike out that and insert a limitation to apply to the money "herein appropriated."

Mr. LEVER. That is absolutely on all fours with the gentleman's argument.

Mr. CRISP. That was the suggestion of Vice President Sherman, to make it apply only to that appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. What the Chair is trying to get settled is whether or not in this case the prior authorizations, with hold-over appropriations with unexpended balances, were involved, or whether the question came up on the future appropriations that were to be made?

Mr. CRISP. I can not possibly present my views any more clearly or cite any authority that is more explicit, or that in my opinion covers the proposition better than the one I have used.

Mr. BARKLEY. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that in the last session of Congress when the military appropriation bill was under consideration an amendment was offered to limit the War Department in the expenditure of money theretofore appropriated for automobiles that would apply up to the 1st day of July, and the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole held it out of order because it limited an appropriation heretofore made.

Mr. CRISP. The Chairman presiding over the House is the honored chairman of the Committee on Rules of this House, and I am sure he will not require me to cite authority on the proposition that you can not under the guise of a limitation legislate so as to interfere with executive discretion on some other appropriation. I am sure the able Chairman recognizes that proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is very clear on that phase of this question. What the Chair is anxious to ascertain is whether in the proviso there is an unexpended balance that would be affected by it.

Mr. CRISP. About that I do not think we ought to be concerned. I do not think we can know as to all of these things. I think all that interests the Chair and myself is what the language of the proviso says. The proviso says that this limitation shall attach to any money heretofore appropriated. The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has stated to the Chair that there are unexpended balances.

Mr. KAHN. There are.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been ruled that the Chair does not take judicial notice of things. It is a question of fact whether there are unexpended balances that would be affected by the proviso.

Mr. CRISP. May I call the attention of the Chair to the statement of the chairman of the committee just now, that there are unexpected balances which would be affected by this proviso. The distinguished Chairman has conceded my point that it is not in order under the guise of a limitation to attach legislation to other acts or to interfere with executive discretion.

Now, there are other appropriations made heretofore that are available for the purchase of land. If you adopt this provision these appropriations cease to be available for the purchase of land. They have a legislative condition tied to them and executive discretion is interfered with. I do not see, Mr. Chairman, how if you follow the ruling of the distinguished late Vice President of the United States you can do otherwise than to sustain my point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I think the provision in the bill is in order as a limitation. I do not think there is any question about that. But I do not intend to take the time of the Chair in the discussion of that view of the matter. The gentleman from Georgia in discussing the Holman rule made no reference to the last proviso of the rule, which is as follows:

That it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the report of the committee or any joint committee authorized by law or the House members of any such commission having jurisdiction of the subject matter of such amendment, which amendment, being germane to the subject matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

This provision under discussion clearly retrenches expenditures. Beyond question this provision retrenches expenditures not only under this bill but expenditures generally. There are, it is true, unexpended balances which can be utilized for the purchase of land, and it is because there are unexpended balances which can not be expended for such purposes if this provision is adopted that makes the provision in order under the last paragraph of the Holman rule.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say on the point of order, in addition to what the gentleman from Wyoming has said, that I understand the rule to be that if it appears on its face, and it is patent to the Chair, that the legislation will have the effect of retrenching expenditures, then it is in order. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the ruling in the Manual, found on page 371, section 825:

To an item of appropriation for transportation of foreign mails, an amendment providing that no money hereby appropriated, etc., shall be expended in carrying out contracts hereafter made under the act known as the "subsidy act," was held to be in order under the rule.

In this case it is provided that no portion of the money shall be used for the purpose of purchasing real estate. That is on all fours with the citation I have called the attention of the Chair to.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. This has reference to the moneys appropriated in this bill, and also has reference to moneys appropriated in other appropriation bills, and therefore it could not apply.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That does not make any difference. In answer to that we make appropriations in the pension bill for the payment of pensions that have already been provided for.

It has been held by the House, and properly, that a certain class of pensioners now on the pension roll, while we have contracted to pay them, should not hereafter receive the pensions. That amendment has been held in order.

Mr. SABATH. That was on a pension bill.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. This is in an appropriation bill for the purpose of providing revenue for the maintenance of the Army and that was in a pension appropriation bill, and it had as much application to a pension appropriation bill as this has application to the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. SABATH. But this states—

Nor shall any of the unexpended balances of appropriations heretofore made——

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It does not make any difference if upon its face it shows that it results in a retrenchment of expenditures; if so, it is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair has been interested to ascertain whether or not any appropriation is to be affected by this proviso except the appropriation made in this bill, and has endeavored to ascertain the amount. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, the gentleman from California, states that there are unexpended balances affected by one of the clauses in this proviso. The sympathies of the Chair are with the proviso, but the Chair must decide what his judgment is of the rules of the House as they apply to this proviso.

Mr. MONDELL. If the Chair will allow me, the Chair is now discussing the matter from the standpoint of the limitation and not from the standpoint of the Holman rule, I understand.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the opinion of the Chair that the Holman rule does not apply in this case.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not understand the Chair to mean that under the Holman rule an amendment could not be offered which affected other appropriations.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming contend that the bill now under consideration could affect an appropriation heretofore made or hereafter to be made under the Holman rule?

Mr. MONDELL. The last paragraph of the Holman rule very distinctly provides that a provision is in order if it retrenches expenditures. No reference is made to appropriations, but if it retrenches expenditures.

The CHAIRMAN. But the constructions heretofore of that clause of the Holman rule have been held to apply to expenditures provided for in the pending appropriation bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. That is true as to a limitation, Mr. Chairman, but it is not true as to legislation which is claimed to be in order under the Holman rule. We do not claim this is in order as a limitation, but we do claim this is in order under the Holman rule. We could put a whole chapter of law on this appropriation bill if the effect of the legislation was to retrench expenditures. May I call the attention of the chairman to the decision by Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, in which he held——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman commences let me make this suggestion. I did not argue to the Chair that provision of the Holman rule, because I did not think it applicable, but I would like to have the gentleman from Minnesota, if he will in presenting his views to the Chair, show wherein this provision retrenches expenditures, because under that provision of the Holman rule it must be apparent to the Chair that it retrenches expenditures, and this limitation does not per se bring about any retrenchment, because it simply says you can not spend this money to buy land but you can spend it to buy powder, shot, or anything on earth you want except land. I would like the gentleman to show to the Chair wherein that retrenches expenditures.

Mr. ANDERSON. The chairman of the committee has stated there are unexpended balances of appropriation which are available for the purchase of land. The gentleman predicated his argument that this was not a limitation upon the theory that there were unexpended balances which were available for the purchase of land. Now, then, when you remove from this appropriation one of the items for which it can be expended you do thereby raise the presumption that the expenditure will be reduced.

Now, I want to call the attention of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole to a decision by Chairman SAUNDERS of Virginia in a recent Congress. I have reference to the decision which appears in section 945 of the House Manual and Digest. In that case an amendment was submitted which proposed to reduce the number of Cavalry regiments from 15 to 10. It did not, as I recall it, in itself propose any actual reduction in the amount carried in the appropriation bill, but the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole held, inasmuch as that amendment did reduce the number of regiments from 15 to 10, that it necessarily followed that it would cost less to support and maintain 10 regiments than 15 regiments, and therefore that the proposed legislation on its face indicated that it would retrench expenditures. It seems to me that decision is entirely in point and practically on all fours with the situation which we have here.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that the proviso referred to does not come within the limitations permitted on an appropriation bill. Congress has the power to withhold appropriations or parts of appropriations. It has that power to withhold money for the purchase of land heretofore authorized to be purchased, for the pay of aeroplanes heretofore authorized to be constructed, or the purchase of aero fields heretofore authorized, but the appropriations affected by such limitations must be the appropriations contained in the pending bill. It is stated that this limitation would affect unexpended balances of appropriation that are still available after the 1st of July that are available until expended. If that is true it would be a change of existing law, and the Chair, for the purpose of accomplishing a temporary end, would not hold that in an appropriation bill we can change existing law.

Now, it is stated that the Saunders decision, on the reduction of Cavalry, is in point. The Chair does not have to review the Saunders decision. It is only necessary to say that the Chair does not take the view that the Holman rule applies in this case. The Chair is not aware of the amount or the extent to which expenditures could be retrenched or made. The Chair has endeavored without result to ascertain the amount, if any, that would be saved. In the Cavalry case it could have been figured to a mathematical certainty just the amount that could be saved by the reduction of the troops of Cavalry. The units were counted there. Here the Chair is simply advised that there are unexpended balances available until expended after the 1st of July, which would be affected by this proviso. That would change the law, and we can not change existing law in that way.

The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the Chair, if I may, if I understand his ruling. If I understand it, the Chair is in harmony with the precedents. You can not on an appropriation bill, as I understand the Chair, do anything more than to limit the amount, touching the amount carried in this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the holding of the Chair.

Mr. CANNON. Now, then, of course, Congress has the power to make another rule, and Congress has the power to do on any other appropriation bill exactly what is sought to be done here.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do rise.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California moves that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that commitee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5227) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, had come to no resolution thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Friday, June 13, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.
